Mr. SMITH of Connecticut viewed this subject as a matter of great moment, not because of the expense involved, but the precedent established by the adoption of it: the step contemplated and those which follow it. My opinion, and which, at the proper time, I am prepared to defend, is that we have no more power by the Constitution to purchase the stock of the Louisville and Portland canal, than we have to purchase the stock of the Erie canal, or any other work which is a great thoroughfare of commerce. He was in favor, however, of the improvement of the natural bed of the river by the removal of the obstructions at the Falls, if it could be accomplished at a reasonable expense, and he thought that the vast and growing commerce of the West demanded it at our hands.

Mr. CRITTENDEN thought that his friend from Alabama [Mr. KING] would, on further reflection, be convinced that the proposed measure was such as should receive his support. The commerce of the West, which is subjected to the tolls levied by the canal company, was estimated at forty millions of dollars annually. This was equal to half of all the cotton exported; and suppose that great staple were subjected to a similar burden, what a clamor would be raised by gentlemen for its removal. As to the connection of the Government with this company, we had no cause to regret it, as it was one of the very few copartnerships in which she had made money; having received during last year, on an investment of $333,000, near $63,000 in the shape of dividends, and having been reimbursed her whole outlay of capital.

Mr. TAPPAN said this was a matter of great importance to the country above, as well as below, Louisville; but he thought the present discussion premature. We had passed a resolution, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information in relation to this subject, and in the prosecution of the inquiry, a letter is sent to the Secretary with a portion of the information. A similar letter is sent to some of the Senators, which is presented here, and has given rise to this debate. It struck him that we ought to wait for the report of the Secretary, before we proceeded to act. Whenever we are prepared to act, I shall go to divest the Government of all her interest in this canal, and sell her present stock, instead of buying more from individuals; and this for the purpose of separating the Government from all connection with this, as I would from all other corporations. He thought that a deepening of the channel of the river would have a very important effect on the interests of Louisville; and though it might not utterly destroy all her commercial facilities, it would form a considerable body of dry land in front of the city, where is now a commodious harbor. The obstructions in the Ohio at that place are not in the nature of falls, though they are thus denominated; but a limestone dyke, running across the channel, which acts as a dam, and backs the water several miles up the river. It is obvious that the cutting down of the dyke would have a material effect, not only on Louisville, but would entirely destroy the canal, leaving its bottom eight feet above the bed of the river. He thought that the canal company would be more difficult to contend with than the falls; as our experience had demonstrated that corporate power was always a more formidable obstruction to the operations of Government than any natural ones. As to the expense of this improvement, it was unimportant when compared with the results to be attained.

The memorial was then referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

On motion by Mr. ROANE, the petition of Captain Thomas Wells, now on the files, was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of inhabitants of the town of Weston, praying for the right of pre emption; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. B. also presented eight memorials of officers of the line of the army, praying equalization of pay with the staff; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented the petition of 1,415 citizens of Alabama, praying remuneration for military services performed in Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KING presented the petition of the widow of George W. Owen; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented a memorial of Joseph L. Smith and others, praying for the establishment of a new department in the Government, to be devoted to the interests of Agriculture and Education; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. WALL, the memorial of Richard S. Coxe, assignee of David Beard, now on file, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. YOUNG presented the petition of Aaron Payne, a soldier of the Black Hawk war, praying arrears of pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TAPPAN submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the following be added to the joint rules of the two House:

Whenever there shall be two decisions against a resolution, petition, or memorial, for a private claim, whether by one or either House, it shall be out of order to act on it again, unless accompanied by affidavit that new testimony has been discovered, believed to be material, and which could not be obtained before.

Mr. KNIGHT, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill for the relief of Hezekiah Cunningham; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Duncan L. Clinch;

Also, a bill for the relief of James Tongue, and the administrator of William Hodson, deceased; which were read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of James Smith, of Arkansas; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish the Senate with such evidence or information as he may possess, showing the cost and expense of cast iron cannon; also the cost and expense of brass cannon; also the cost and expense of wrought iron cannon; also the superiority of one over the other, taking into consideration the first cost, wear, and general utility.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of a district attorney and marshal for the middle district of Alabama.

ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS.

The report of the Select Committee on the assumption by the Government of the debts of the States was taken up, and Mr. CLAY of Alabama made an able argument in favor of the principles of the report, and in reply to the remarks of Mr. CRITTENDEN and others.

Mr. CRITTENDEN replied to the remarks of Mr. CLAY, and

On motion of Mr. PHELPS,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 3, 1840.

The tellers who were appointed to count the vote on Friday last, under the resolution of Mr. BLACK, for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the propriety of reducing the present price of the public printing, or of establishing a National office, by Cong ess, to execute the same, reported the following as the result:

Whole number of votes - - -	216
Necessary to a choice - -	109
Mr. BLACK received - - -	187
J. W. DAVIS, of Indiana -	130
PRENTISS - - -	129

And fifty other gentlemen were voted for, who received from one to four votes each.

Messrs. BLACK, J. W. DAVIS, of Indiana, and PRENTISS, were declared to be elected.

The SPEAKER said it would be neccessary to go into another vote to elect two others, to make the number required by the resolution.

Mr. GRAVES moved a call of the House, before proceeding to vote for the remaining two; and called for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken by count, whether there should be a call—ayes 16, nays 80; no quorum voting.

The House was again divided to ascertain whether there should be a call—ayes 48, noes 66; still no quorum voting.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved there be a call, and demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which

So the House determined that there should be a call; which was proceeded in till the roll was gone through with, and 186 members answered to their names.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON moved that all further proceedings in the call be dispensed with. Upon a count, it appeared that there were—ayes 77, noes 26.

No quorum having voted,

The SPEAKER decided that the call should proceed. The roll was again called over, and 194 members answered to their names. Excuses were being received for the absentees, when,

On motion of Mr. CHAPMAN, all further proceeding in the call was dispensed with.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON made an ineffectual effort to introduce a resolution to appropriate a portion of the wood at the Capitol to the suffering poor of Washington City.

Mr. LINCOLN did not wish to be voted for again as a candidate to serve on the Committee on Printing. He already belonged to two committees were ordered, and were—yeas 87, nays 77.

The House again proceeded to vote viva voce for two members, the number requisite to constitute the committee—the same gentlemen acting as tellers. The following is the result:

Whole number of votes - -	183
Necessary to a choice - -	94
Mr. EVANS received - - -	113

Messrs. R. GARLAND and EVANS were declared to be elected.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, the joint resolution from the Senate, proposing the election of Chaplain, was taken up, and concurred in.

The House then proceeded to vote viva voce for Chaplain.

Nominations were then made as follows:

Mr. BARNARD nominated the Rev. Mr. DANFORTH, Presbyterian.

Mr. DAVIES, of Pa. nominated the Rev. Mr. BABBITT, of the Dutch Reformed Church.

Mr. PETRIKIN nominated the Rev. Mr. WILMER, Episcopalian.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, nominated the Rev. Mr. BALCH, Presbyterian.

Mr. SALTONSTALL nominated the Rev. Mr. BATES, Congregationalist.

Mr. SMITH of Maine, nominated the Rev. Mr. BOYD, Protestant Episcopal Church.

Mr. CROCKETT nominated the Rev. Mr. REESE, Protestant Methodist.

Mr. TALIAFERRO nominated the Rev. Mr. BRAXTON:

Mr. PARRIS nominated the Rev. Mr. DONELLAN, Catholic.

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. BARNARD, TALIAFERRO, DAVIES of Pennsylvania, and SALTONSTALL, as tellers, to ascertain the vote; who reported the following result, viz:

Rev. Mr. Danforth	received	29 votes.
" Babbitt - - -		19

No person having received a majority of votes,

The SPEAKER said the House would again proceed to vote; but before doing so,

On motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, February 4, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of 22d January, 1840; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the Secretary of War, containing an enumeration of the militia of the United States; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ABOLITION PETITIONS.

Mr. TAPPAN addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I hold in my hand a number of petitions, purporting to be signed by inhabitants of Harrison county, in the State of Ohio, praying Congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia. These petitions are signed by both males and females, in the proportion of about two-thirds of the former, and one-third of the latter. It is the constitutional right of every American citizen to petition Congress for a redress of grievances; and I may say here, that whenever any citizen of Ohio shall complain of any grievance, under which he may be suffering, within the constitutional competency of this Government to remove, it will give me great pleasure to present the case to this body, and to be instrumental in removing the grievance complained of.

These petitioners do not, however, set forth what particular grievance the existence of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia is to them, how they are injuriously affected by it, nor why and wherefore it should be abolished. I am left to suppose, therefore, that the interest the petitioners feel in this matter is not a particular interest, arising from any connection with the subject matter prayed for, not a grievance to them specially, but that they suppose the existence of slavery and the slave trade here is a grievance of a general and national kind, which they, with all other American citizens, have a right to petition Congress to remove. I am very far from questioning the right of any citizen of this Union to petition Congress, or their right to instruct their Representatives here as to such legislation for this District, as will, in their opinion, best promote the general interest of the whole Confederacy; but I mark the fact, that the petitioners were not agreed upon the nature, extent, and bearing of the supposed grievances they pray to have redressed, and were not prepared to assign any reason for their removal, as evidence that they had no particular cause of complaint in the existence of slavery here. Living at the distance of some hundred miles from the District, in a remote State of the Union, and having little or no intercourse with it, it is not to be presumed that they should be as competent to judge what legislation would best promote the prosperity and happiness of the people here, as the citizens of the District themselves, who are to be more immediately affected by such legislation. The petitioners have, indeed, no right to interpose their wishes, or will, as to such interests as are peculiar to the population of the District, and have no bearing on the general interests of the Union. This, it may be presumed, is well known to and understood by them, and therefore the conclusion I have come to, that the petitioners have no particular interest in this matter, and have no claims to a hearing on that account, is sufficiently evident.

I have no doubt but that the Constitution, by giving to Congress the power "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever" over this District, has given Congress the power to abolish slavery and the slave trade here whenever the people of the District ask, or the safety of the whole Union requires it. Congress, as the constitutional Legislature of this District, have, in my judgment, a twofold duty to perform—first, as the Representatives of the District, not elected and chosen by the people of the District, but made by the Constitution the only law-making power for it, and thereby its constitutional Representatives: second, as the Representatives of the whole nation. In the former capacity, the power of Congress extending "to all cases whatsoever," seems limited only by those great principles of equality and justice which lay at the foundation of all our legislation; in the latter they can exercise no powers but such as are expressly delegated to them, or such as are clearly necessary to carry into effect the powers so expressly granted. The principles adverted to, require of American legislators that they should make the happiness of the people the end and aim of all their enactments. In their first capacity, therefore, as the Legislature of the District, they are bound to consult the will and wishes of the District, in all matters which concern its inhabitants only. I conceive that the will of the people here should be the governing rule for the action of Congress, in all matters of strictly local concern; unless that will demanded something which would be injurious to the general welfare. The reason why the framers of the Constitution gave to Congress, and not to a local Legislature, the power of legislation over the District, was probably to prevent the possibility of any law being passed here, which might militate against the general interest of the Confederacy; and not to free Congress from the high moral obligation, incumbent on it as the Legislature of the District, to consult the wishes of the people of the District, and form its laws, so as best to promote their welfare and happiness.

But the people of the District are silent on this subject; they ask for no change in their domestic policy; they have heretofore remonstrated against any action by Congress on their right to hold slaves, and would probably again remonstrate, if they apprehended any danger of such action. They hold that they have a clearly legal and rightful property in and to their slaves; that the Constitution of the United States protects them in the enjoyment of such right. Now, whatever may be the opinion of the petitioners as to the right, abstractedly considered, of men to hold human beings as property, this question was settled before the Constitution was formed—before this ten miles square was ceded to the Union; and Congress, as legislators of the Union, have no power over it.

Next to the people of this District, those more immediately interested are the States who ceded this Territory to the United States. The cession was made by Maryland and Virginia, when, as now, both those States held slaves; and their right to this species of property was no where questioned. It may fairly be supposed, that when the cession was made, it was not imagined by any one that slavery would, or could be abolished here, until it should be abolished in those States. Had such an event been thought probable, the able men who guided the counsels of those States would have guarded against an event so very threatening to their security and repose. But these States are not alone in regarding the measures prayed for by the petitioners as hostile to their interests; all the States in which slavery is held lawful, consider the agitation of this question as full of danger, and the attempt to abolish slavery here, but as a first step in an unjust and unconstitutional interference with their rights. If, then, Congress has the power to legislate for this District on this subject, as I hold they clearly have such power, they have no right to exercise this power against the will of the inhabitants of the District; against the will of those who ceded the District to the Union; and against the will of the other slaveholding States; unless, indeed, the safety of the whole Union imperiously demands such legislation of us.

When this confederacy of States was formed, and even when the Consitution of the United States was adopted, most of the States held slaves. The laws of all (except, perhaps, Massachusetts) recognised the lawfulness of domestic slavery. Since that time, many of the States have entirely, and some others partially, abolished it; and it seems to me that it is, and has long been, in a gradual course of extinction. It is, however, an institution of the State Governments, a matter of mere State regulation, with which, as it exists in, or may be regulated by, the States, the Government of the United States, having nothing to do directly, should abstain from interfering indirectly.

Such, Mr. President, is my view of the subject, as it respects the power and duties of Congress; but there is another view which it is my duty to state. I am here as one of the representatives of a sovereign State, meeting with the representatives of twenty-five other equally sovereign and independent States, to exercise with my friend and colleague those strictly limited powers which have been conferred on the General Government, and bound by every principle of duty, of honor, and of inclination, to obey the will of the State whose servant I am.

The State I in part represent, is one of the first in this Union in all the elements of political power; it is not second to any in its entire devotion to those principles of equality and justice, which are the professed foundation of our social institutions; to none in her firm attachment to the union of the States. She would not permit any interference on the part of other States or societies with her institutions, unless addressed directly to her friendly consideration by those who might consider themselves aggrieved by them; nor would she interfere with the laws and regulations of other States, or justify her citizens in doing so, under any other circumstances. Slavery is an institution not only interdicted by the fundamental laws of Ohio, but it is entirely contrary to the genius and habits of her people. If petitions were to be presented here, praying some action of Congress which would, though but indirectly and remotely, tend to establish slavery in Ohio, or which her citizens believed would have that tendency, such a measure could not but be regarded as one of hostility to Ohio by her representatives here; and hostility, too, not from an individual Senator, but from a co-State; for Senators, being representatives of sovereign States, cannot be presumed to act from themselves merely, but only by authority of the State whose agents they are. Ohio might, and probably would, treat all such demonstrations with scorn and contempt; but if persisted in, and followed up from year to year, evincing a settled determination to compel a change, she could not but regard the States whose representatives here promoted such attacks upon her, as unfriendly towards her.

Ohio will do unto others as she claims that they should do to her: as she will not permit any interference with her own institutions, so she will not permit her servants to interfere with the institutions of other States. I know her will upon this matter; it is clear and unequivocal. Resolutions of her Assembly have repeatedly declared her sentiments upon the subject-matter of these petitions, and her decided opinion that the attempt making by these petitioners, "is hostile to the spirit of the Constitution, and destructive of the harmony of the Union;" and a recent more numerous assemblage of Democratic delegates in a State convention, than has ever before met in that State, with but three dissenting voices, adopted the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this convention, Congress ought not, without the consent of the people of the District, and of the States of Virginia and Maryland, to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; and that the efforts now making for that purpose by organized societies in the free States, are hostile to the spirit of the Constitution, and destructive to the harmony of the Union.

"Resolved, That slavery being a domestic institution recognised by the Constitution of the United States, we, as citizens of a free State, have no right to interfere with it, and that the organizing of societies and associations in free States, in opposition to the institutions of sister States, while productive of no good, may be the cause of much mischief; and while such associations, for political purposes, ought to be discountenanced by every lover of peace and concord, no sound Democrat will have part or lot with them.

"Resolved, That political Abolitionism is but ancient Federalism, under a new guise, and that the political action of anti-slavery societies, is only a device for the overthrow of Democracy."

I know, sir, that these resolutions express the deliberate judgment of the Democracy of Ohio; as to the sentiments of the opponents of the Democratic party, the Harrisonians,* I know less. Their conduct is open to observation. By that it is well known that they hold in their fraternal embrace the entire Abolition part of the population of Ohio.

As to the female signers of these petitions, I have a word to say. Nature seems to have given to the male sex the exclusive powers of government, by giving to that sex the physical strength and energy which the exercise of those powers calls into constant and active exertion. To the female a more delicate physical organization is given; and she need not repine that she has not the iron nerve of her protector, man; he has the storms of life to encounter; she the calm and sunshine of domestic peace and quiet to enjoy. Hers is the domestic altar; there she ministers and commands, in all the plenitude of undisputed sway, the fountain of love and blessedness to all around her; let her not seek madly to descend from this eminence to mix with the strife of ambition or the cares of Government; the field of politics is not her appropriate arena; the powers of Government are not within her cognizance, as they could not be within her knowledge, unless she neglected higher and holier duties to acquire it. Bound by her associations, by her education and habits, as the American woman is, to the institutions and laws and manners of her country, let her evidence the soundness of her principles, by guiding the young minds committed to her maternal charge, to that same love of liberty and devotion to their country she feels, and she need not fear but that her sons will correct all the errors of Government, as experience shall point them out. For myself, I cannot recognise the right of my fair countrywomen to interference with public affairs. Whether slavery shall be abolished in the District of Columbia or not, belongs not to them to say; much less does it belong to the women of Ohio to agitate questions of public policy, which their own State Government has often declared it wrong in her citizens to meddle with.

For these reasons, I decline presenting these petitions to the Senate.

Mr. PRESTON said there was nothing before the Senate to excuse his remarks, but he could not repress the feelings of pleasure and satisfaction with which he had listened to the eloquence and patriotic remarks of the Senator from Ohio. Should the same sentiments be expressed from other sections of the country, the incendiary spirit of Abolitionism would soon be trampled down and extinct. Standing in the political relations he did to the Senator, he could express his feelings more freely; and for himself, and in behalf of the section of the Union more particularly interested in this matter, he tendered to the Senate his sincere and heartfelt thanks.

Mr. FULTON presented the petition of Henry Wilson, praying to be allowed to locate on any of the unappropriated public lands a tract of land in lieu of a like quantity erroneously entered by him at the land office at Helena; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. WALL, the petition and papers of Francis Cazeau, now on the files, were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. YOUNG presented the memorial of the Galena Chamber of Commerce, praying an appropriation for the removal of obstructions to the navigation of the Upper and Lower Rapids of the Mississippi river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. TALLMADGE, it was ordered that the petition of the widow of George Hood, now on file, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MERRICK presented the memorial of the president and directors of the Bank of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, praying an extension of their charter, for the purpose of enabling them to wind up the affairs of that institution; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. LINN presented the memorial of W. A. Duer and others, praying that surveys may be an-

*HARRISONIANS.—A large meeting of the Whig party at Chillicothe, in Ohio, lately adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, By this meeting, that the cause in which we are engaged is the cause of civil liberty, and the perpetuity of our happy, but at present deranged institutions. And knowing as we do, that political names alone keep many from our ranks whose hearts are with us, now be it known and resolved, from this day forward, that all political names, such as Loco Foco, Democrat, Republican, Whig, etc. be now merged in the general and heart-stirring appellation of Harrisonians.

thorized by the United States, with a view to the ascertaining the practicability of constructing a ship canal across the Isthmus of Panama, and when ascertained, that the co-operation of other Governments be invited in the accomplishment of that object; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MERRICK submitted a communication from Noah Fairbank, containing suggestions in relation to the means of securing steamboats against fire; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITE submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate what measures have been taken to ascertain and satisfy the debts of the Winnebago nation of Indians, for the payment of which the residuary sum of $150,000 was appropriated by the fourth article of the treaty of 1st November, 1837, made with that nation.

Also, what causes have interposed to prevent the removal of those Indians to the "neutral ground" west of the Mississippi, in pursuance of the third article of said treaty.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of Jacob Dunham, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to will was referred the bill for the relief of certain companies of Michigan Militia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of John L. Scott, reported it without amendment.

Mr. W. also, from the Committee on Claims, to which the following bills were referred:

A bill for the relief of William Berret;
A bill for the relief of Charles A. Dodge;
A bill for the relief of Dennis Quinlivan;
A bill for the relief of Alfred Westfall;
A bill for the relief of James H. Ralston;
A bill for the relief of David McNair;
A bill for the relief of Jacob Hanks; and
A bill for the relief of Samuel Ferguson; reported the same severally without amendment, and recommended that they do not pass.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred a memorial of the Board of Health of the city of Washington, reported a bill to authorize the erection of a hospital in the city of Washington, and for other purposes; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the petition of Zadoc Martin, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. W. from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Samuel Massey and Thomas James; which was agreed to.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. NICHOLAS asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to authorize the Legislature of the State of Louisiana to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools within that State; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. FULTON asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to perfect the titles to lands south of the Arkansas river, held under New Madrid locations and pre-emption rights under the act of 1814; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. LINN asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to quiet the titles of certain land claimants in the State of Missouri and Arkansas, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. YOUNG submitted the following motion, which, by unanimous consent, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of settling the accounts of Francis Gehon, late Marshal of Wisconsin, and now Marshal of Iowa Territory, on just and equitable principles.

Mr. WHITE presented three petitions from citizens of the Territory of Wisconsin, praying that certain lands in the Milwaukie land district may be exposed to public sale, and that pre-emption rights may be granted to the settlers thereon; which were severally referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. WHITE submitted the following motion, which, by unanimous consent, was considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing a survey to be made of the Ohio river at the falls, with a view to ascertain the practicability of improving the navigation thereof.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion submitted by Mr. WEBSTER, on the 27th ult. in relation to vessels propelled by steam; which was, on his motion, amended and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire whether the laws respecting vessels propelled by steam do not require amendment, and whether it be not expedient, among other provisions, to make the following, viz:

1st. That the owners or masters of all steamboats or vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, employed in the transportation of passengers, or of goods, wares, or merchandise, or of both, for hire, shall be deemed to all intents and purposes common carriers thereof, and shall be liable to all the duties and responsibilities imposed on such carriers by the common law. And every restriction, limitation, or qualification, of any such duties and responsibilities, by any special notice or contract, or other proceeding on the part of such carriers, shall be deemed utterly void and of no validity, or force, or effect whatever.

2d. That whenever any loss, damage, or injury, shall occur to any passenner, or to any goods, wares, or merchandise on board of any such steamboat or other vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, from fire or steam, or collision with any other vessel, the same shall be deemed full prima facie evidence of negligence, sufficient to charge the proprietors of such steamboat or other vessel propelled by steam, and those in their employment, with the full amount of such loss, or damage, or injury, until they shall show, beyond any reasonable doubt, that no negligence whatever had occurred on their part.

3d. That if any inspector or inspectors, appointed under the law to which this is a supplement, shall carelessly or negligently perform the duties required of them by law, or shall make or sign any certificate required by the same act, knowing the same to contain any false statement, he and they shall be deemed guilty of high misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof before any court of the United States having competent jurisdiction, be punished by fine not exceeding $500, and by imprisonment not exceeding ninety days, according to the aggravation of the offence, and shall also be liable in civil action to all damages which shall be occasioned thereby to any person or persons whatever; and that the committee be instructed further to inquire and report to the Senate what judicial decisions have been made under the existing law, and especially whether it has been the effect of any such decision to render the existing law inoperative in any part of the country.

The resolution submitted some days since by Mr. PRESTON, calling for the reasons of Gov. Call's dismissal, and the correspondence of that officer with the Secretary of War, was taken up, and being modified, on motion by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, by striking out that part calling for the reasons of dismissal, were passed.

The bill to repeal certain acts respecting navy pensions, and making further provisions in relation to navy pensions, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a hird reading.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill confirming certain land claims in the Ouachita land district, in the State of Louisiana;

The bill to authorise the issuing of a patent to the heirs or legal representatives of Francis Rivard, deceased;

The bill confirming certain land claims in Louisiana; and

The bill for the relief of Obed P. Lacy; were severally read a third time, and passed.

The bill to transfer to the citizens of the parish of Concordia, in the State of Louisiana, the interest of the United States to a certain tract of land, was taken up on its third reading, but

Mr. WALKER intimating an intention to oppose the bill, it was passed over.

ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS.

The report of the select committee on the assumption by the Government of the debts of the States, was then taken up, and Mr. PHELPS addressed the Senate at length in opposition to it.

On motion by Mr. CALHOUN,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, February 4, 1840.

Mr. BLACK, by permission of the House, reported from the select Committee of Printing, the following resolution, the passage of which he said was necessary to enable the committee to procced in the investigation:

Resolved, That the select committee on Printing, appointed by a resolution of this House on the 30th ultimo, be authorized and permitted to employ a clerk to facilitate and record the proceedings of said committee.

Resolved, That said committee be authorized to summon and examine witnesses on oath before them, relative to the subject submitted to their consideration.

Mr. ADAMS said the latter part of the resolution was unnecessary, and provision was already made by law, empowering select committees to examine witnesses on oath. He hoped the gentleman would modify his resolution.

Mr. BLACK said he was not at liberty to modify the resolution. It was discussed in committee in the present form, and adopted, and he was instructed to report it to the House.

Mr. ADAMS moved to strike out the last resolution, and amend the first by the insertion of the following words: "And shall have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment: not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was carried in the affirmative, and the resolution as amended was adopted.

The House again proceeded to the election by viva voce for Chaplain—Messrs. TALIAFERRO, SALTONSTALL, DAVIES of Pa. and SMITH of Maine, acting as tellers. The tellers reported the following as the result of the second vote:

Whole number of votes	-	-	182
Necessary to a choice	-	-	92
And that the Rev. Mr. Danforth received			31 votes.
" " Bates	"		36
" " Babbitt	"		6
" " Balch	"		34
" " Boyd	"		28
" " Braxton	"		34
" " Wilmer	"		13

The names of the Rev. Messrs. Reese and Donnellan were withdrawn after the first vote of yesterday.

No person having received a majority of votes, there was no election.

The House again proceeded to vote, the same gentlemen acting as tellers. The tellers reported the following as the result of the THIRD VOTE.

Whole number received	-	-	176
Necessary to a choice	-	-	89
Rev. Mr. Danforth	received	-	22 votes.
" Bates	-	-	55
" Babbit	-	-	1
" Balch	-	-	35
" Boyd	-	-	16
" Braxton	-	-	42
" Wilmer	-	-	5

Still no choice.

Mr. SMITH withdrew the name the Rev. Mr. Boyd.

Mr. BARNARD withdrew the name of the Rev Mr. Danforth; and

Mr. JENIFER withdrew the name of the Rev. Mr. Wilmer.

FOURTH VOTE.

Whole number received - -	182
Necessary to a choice - -	92
Rev. Mr. Bates received - -	85 votes.
" Balch - - -	19
" Braxton - - -	77
" Wilmer - - -	1

Still no choice.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland withdrew the name of the Rev. Mr. Balch.

Mr. POPE moved that, by universal consent, the House would take the next vote by ballot; but

Mr. HOFFMAN and others objected; and the House proceeded, in the usual way, to the FIFTH VOTE.

Whole number of votes - -	175
Necessary to a choice - - -	88
The Rev. Mr. Bates received -	92
Mr. Braxton -	83

The Rev. Mr. BATES was therefore elected.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Honorable the House of Representatives:

I lay before you a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, with several documents annexed, by which it will be seen that judicial constructions have been given to the existing laws for the collection of imposts affecting extensively and injuriously the accruing revenue.

They embrace, with many others, the important articles of linens, woollens, and cottons: the two last of which are often treated as silks, because that material constitutes a component part of them, and thus exempted them from duty altogether. Assessments of duties, which have prevailed for years, and, in some cases, since the passage of the laws themselves, are in this manner altered, and uncertainty and litigation introduced in regard to the future.

The effects which these proceedings have already produced in diminishing the amount of the revenue, and which are likely to increase hereafter, deserve your early consideration.

I have, therefore, deemed it necessary to bring the matter to your notice, with a view to such legislative action as the exigencies of the case may in your judgment require. It is not believed that any law, which can now be passed upon the subject, can affect the revenue favorably for several months to come, and could not, therefore, be safely regarded as a substitute for the early provision of certain and adequate means to enable the Treasury to guard the public credit, and meet promptly and faithfully any deficiencies that may occur in the revenue, from whatever cause they may arise.

The reasons in favor of the propriety of adopting, at an early period, proper measures for that purpose, were explained by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report, and recommended to your attention by myself. The experience of the last two months, and especially the recent decisions of the courts, with the continued suspension of specie payments by the banks over large sections of the United States, operating unfavorably upon the revenue, have greatly strengthened the views then taken of the subject.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4, 1840.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
January 31, 1840.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose some correspondence between myself and the Comptroller, in relation to the great changes of construction, made chiefly by the judicial tribunals, in the present laws imposing duties on foreign merchandise. Several of the cases have already been laid before the appropriate committees of Congress, without producing any new legislation; but all the material decisions are now collected and submitted together for consideration. Most of these changes possess importance in various points of view, though the one connected with the revenue seems to require special notice from this Department. The articles as to which the principal difficulties have occurred, whether by judicial decisions or otherwise, are linens, silks, woollens, and cottons. For instance, imported linens, though dyed or stained by artificial process, and thus supposed by the Department to be liable to a duty, have been pronounced "bleached and unbleached linens," so as to render them free. Again, silks, when coming from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, are subject to a duty; but those from Europe, with some exceptions, are not. Hence the former, by being landed, and colored or stamped in Europe, before reaching here, are believed to be often introduced free, contrary to my own opinion of the original design of Congress.

Several articles, also, are now imported from Europe, which have been adjudged by the courts to be free, because manufactures of silk; though under their appropriate names, as "hose," "gloves," "shawls," "millinery," and other descriptions of goods, they were for several years regarded as liable to duty, and taxed accordingly.

Manufactures of woollen and cotton are subject to a large duty; but of late, by mixing wool and cotton in fabrics with silk, they are often imported at a lower rate of duty, or entirely free, under judicial decisions, reversing the former usages in force.

Other material changes have occurred through these decisions; such as that "sewing silk," which still pays a duty, does not embrace some merchandise, though made of silk, and used for sewing. Several alterations have likewise been adopted, exempting from the duties on woollen and cotton, various new articles mixed with "worsted," or unexpectedly considered by the courts and juries as "worsted," and hence pronounced to be free. Other goods have been relieved from the high duty on "ready made clothing," and subjected to only a lower rate of impost, under other names, though made up as articles of clothing, and ready to be worn. Uniform rules of construction on these subjects, which have prevailed since the laws passed, have thus, in some cases, been suddenly altered, and much money already in the Treasury has been refunded, and other duties secured or paid, are liable to be remitted hereafter.

Several articles also, must hereafter be entered free, which, it has been before supposed, were subject to duty, and others must be admitted at a lower rate than the previous usage. In a few cases only can attempts be made to reverse the decisions by appeals or writs of error, as the amount in controversy in each case, is frequently too small, or the difficulty exists, at times, in the finding of the jury, when the general directions of the judge may have been unexceptionable.

From these circumstances the revenue has already suffered extensively within a few months, and the annual loss to the customs by all the decisions before referred to, is computed to equal at least two millions of dollars.

All the details, deemed useful on these points, are embodied in the report of the Comptroller, replying to my letter, and in other documents, copies of which are annexed. Whichever construction in these cases be in the view of Congress correct, whether that adopted by the courts, or the Department, it is highly important to have a declaratory law passed, settling the rule clearly for the future in all doubtful cases. It seems, also, equally important to have such new provisions in respect to the tariff introduced, as shall protect more effectually the collection of those duties, which Congress designed should be imposed for carrying on successfully the operations of the Government, and preserving inviolate the public faith.

The opportunity afforded on this occasion for supplying the amount of revenue already lost, and also any amount likely to be needed, to meet the public engagements hereafter, by requiring a duty on some articles now free, might be improved beneficially, without a departure from the compromise act, and without agitating the question of protection.

Besides the wide field open for this purpose in one-half of the usual importations now entirely free, the Department, under a special act of Congress, still in force, has been obliged to remit the large amount of three and a half millions of duties, secured on the single article of railroad iron, and must continue to remit similar duties, until it si deemed proper to revise the legislation on this subject.

Another inroad on the accruing duties, to the extent of two or three hundred thousand dollars already remitted, and in a course of being so, is, by another especial act, on account of the fire and fire bonds in New York, in 1835 and '36. Other applications for remission of duties on account of similar losses, at a very recent period, will probably follow to the extent of from 50 to 100,000 dollars, and may be found just. But it is proper to add, that any kind of legislation on the subject matter of this communication, during the present session of Congress, would not be likely to increase the resources of the Treasury in season for aid to meet existing appropriations, in any exigency such as, in my last annual report, it was explained that the Treasury would be exposed to in the ensuing month. The very large sums then required to pay pensions under laws already in force, and to redeem many of the Treasury notes outstanding and falling due in March, demand an earlier and prompter remedy. Yet in the event that Congress shall soon make some precautionary provision of means, to be used only when needed, and which are so justly due to a wise regard for preserving the public faith, under the fluctuations, necessities, and contingencies to which our fiscal operations are dangerously liable, increased security for the plighted faith of the United States, may be derived from the proposed legislation on the present subject.

Respectfully,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

To the President of the United States.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the message and documents accompanying were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. BANKS, it was

Resolved, That the 20th rule of the House, which authorizes the reception of petitions daily for thirty days only, after the organization of the House, be extended to the 15th of February.

Mr. W. THOMPSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to raise 1600 men to serve against the Florida Indians; which was read twice, and on Mr. T's motion, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PETRIKIN, in accordance with notice previously given, reported a bill to repeal an act to relieve from duty iron prepared and actually laid on railways or inclined planes, approved 14th July, 1832, and to graduate the duty to be paid on such iron hereafter imported from foreign countries.

On motion of Mr. P. referred to the Committee on Manufactures, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARRETT DAVIS, from the Committee on the Territories, made a report in relation to the difficulties between the State of Missouri and the Territory of Iowa, accompanied by a bill, entitled "An act to establish and define the Northern boundary line of the State of Missouri;" which bill was twice read, and on motion of Mr. D. referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS to take up the Senate bills on the SPEAKER's table, for the purpose of reference to appropriate committees,

The bill making appropriations to complete the removal of the raft of the Red river, and for other purposes, was twice read; when

Mr. BIDDLE moved that the same be referred, with the following instructions:

1. Whether the advance of money by the Bank of Arkansas, which it is one of the objects of this bill to reimburse, was not made with full knowledge that the agent of the United States who effected the loan was acting in defiance of positive instructions from his superiors, as well as in the face of a known refusal by Congress to appropriate money to the work.

2. Whether the estimate on which the bill is founded was not made by the said agent prio to the closing up of the raft in August last; and whether any satisfactory data exist for computing the probable cost of removing the present impediments to navigation.

3. Whether the sum appropriated by this bill is called for in the estimates accompanying the President's message.

4. Whether the bill is not of such a character that it ought to have originated in this House.

Mr. BIDDLE having indicated a wish to address the House on this bill, yielded the floor to

Mr. WISE, on whose motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, February 5, 1840.

On motion by Mr. WHITE, the petition of Abner E. Van Ness, on the files, was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. WRIGHT, the widow of Joseph Yorke had leave to withdraw her petition and papers.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented the petition of a number of citizens of Fayette county, Pa. for a reduction of postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MERRICK presented the memorial of Casper W. Weaver; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the petition of Leonard Bleeker; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. T. also presented the memorial of Silas M. Stillwell, and N. T. Eldridge, of New York, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the petition of a number of citizens of the State of Maine, praying that measures may be taken to avoid wars between nations, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ROANE presented the petition of James McCally; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PRESTON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate whether, in his annual report, made at the commencement of the present session of Congress, and in the estimates therein contained of expenditures proposed for the current year, he has included any sum, or proposed any appropriation, for the construction and continuation of the Cumberland road, and, if not, whether the omission was unintentional or designed.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a higher minimum price for the lands contained in the Miami reserve, situated in the State of Indiana.

Mr. HUBBARD, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the settlement of the claims of New Hampshire against the United States; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution relative to taking the ensuing census of the United States; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill providing for the enlistment of 1,500 men, for the defence of Florida; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Francis Careau; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The resolutions submitted yesterday by Messrs. SMITH of Connecticut and WHITE, were considered and agreed to.

The bill to repeal certain acts respecting navy pensions, and making further provisions in relation to navy pensions, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS.

The report of the Select Committee on the assumption by the Government of the debts of the States was taken up, and Mr. CALHOUN addressed the Senate at length in defence of the doctrines of the report.

Mr. PRESTON, after a few remarks, moved to lay the report on the table, which was negatived—yeas 16, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Betts, Clay of Kentuky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Henderson, Merrick, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Tallmadge, and White—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—29.

The question then coming up on printing the usual number of the report,

Mr. SMITH of Indiana stated that, though he was opposed to the doctrines of the report, and had been one of the minority on the committee which made it, he yet thought it was due to the committee, and to the members of the Senate agreeing with them in opinion, that the usual number of the report should be printed. For these reasons he should vote in favor of the motion.

Mr. HENDERSON expressed similar sentiments.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 36, noes 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Betts, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Merrick, Phelps, Ruggles, Southard, and Spence—8.

Mr. GRUNDY then moved to postpone its further consideration, and make it the special order of the day for Monday next; which was agreed to.

Mr. BENTON said, in pursuance of the notice he had given, he now moved that thirty thousand additional copies of the report be printed.

Mr. LUMPKIN said that, though a member of the Select Committee which submitted this report, had this question been submitted when the report was brought in, he would not have voted for the extra number. But now, when it has been attacked with unprecedented violence, and comments on it circulated far and wide, before one half of the members of the Senate have had an opportunity of examining it, he was for giving it as wide a circulation as the comments made upon it. He would, therefore, vote for the extra number.

The question was then taken and agreed to—ayes 27, noes 18.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, February 5, 1840.

The presentation of petitions being the first thing in order, the SPEAKER commenced the call of the States for that purpose, beginning with the State of Massachusetts.

Petitions and memorials were then presented by Messrs. PARMENTER, LINCOLN, H. WILLIAMS, BRIGGS, CUSHING, W. S. HASTINGS, REED; and Mr. LAWRENCE presented a petition praying the recognition of the independence of the Government of Hayti; which was read, when Mr. L. moved its reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BANKS moved that it be laid on the table; upon which motion the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JAMESON, who was absent at the time his name was called, desired to vote, but it was ruled out of order; when Mr. J. moved that his vote be recorded in the affirmative.

The CHAIR said it would not then be in order.

Mr. JAMESON, for the purpose of having his motion placed on the journal, would take an appeal from that decision, and demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. JENIFER inquired if it would at that time be in order to entertain an appeal.

The CHAIR said the decision would be arbitrary if it was not entertained at that time. If it was not then in order it would not be at any other time.

Mr. DAWSON thought it would do the greatest injustice to the SPEAKER to take an appeal from a just decision, merely to get such a motion entered on the journal contrary to the rules.

Mr. JAMESON did not wish to do injustice to the SPEAKER. He had made a request of the House, to give him permission to record his vote; but objection had been made, very improperly, and he thought it perfectly in order to make the motion he had.

Mr. DAWSON hoped the gentleman would see the impropriety of the course, and withdraw his appeal.

Mr. JAMESON withdrew his appeal.

The question on laying on the table was decided in the affirmative—yeas 110, nays 63.

Petitions were further presented from Massachusetts, by Messrs. WM. B. CALHOUN, BAKER, SALTONSTALL, and ADAMS.

[Mr. SALTONSTALL presented the memorial of sundry citizens of Boston, merchants, praying indemnification for property sequestrated by the Governor of Hayti, many years ago.]

[Mr. ADAMS presented a memorial from the American Philosophical Society, praying an appropriation by Congress to carry on a series of magnetical experiments, and meteorological observations which was referred to a select committee of nine, to be appointed for that purpose, and ordered to be printed. Also, from W. McNally, and twelve hundred other signers, American seamen, praying Congress to take into consideration their unprotected condition, and grant some appropriate relief: referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed. Mr. A. hoped that committee would take the matter into serious consideration, for he believed there was no class of the free people of the United States who so much needed a revision of the laws for their protection.]

[Mr. PARMENTER presented the memorial of Lemuel Wheelock and others, contesting the right of OSMYN BAKER to a seat in the House, as a Representative from the Sixth Congressional District of Massachusetts, setting forth that he was not chosen by a majority of the votes of said district as required by the laws of Massachusetts and the Constitution of the United States, to which committee, on motion of Mr. LINCOLN, the certificate of election, given to Mr. BAKER by the Governor of Massachusetts, was also referred. Also, the petition of Elizabeth Stockwell for a Revolutionary pension; of Mary Reed for the same; of Lucy Tugalls for the same; of William Kilham and others, of Saxonville, Massachusetts, for security against frauds in duties on woollens; of Seth Bemis and others, of Waltham, Massachusetts, for the same purpose; of Benjamin B. Adams and others, for a mail route from Framingham to Chelseyford, Massachusetts; of Joel Knight and seventy-five others, praying that the exportation of opium to China in American vessels may be prohibited; of Benjamin Hawkes for the regulation of pay; of Ellery Brown for Revolutionary pension; which were appropriately referred.]

[Mr. HASTINGS of Massachusetts presented the petition of David Davenport and twenty-two other citizens of Mendon, Mass.; praying that the rates of letter postage may be so reduced as not to exceed ten cents on a single letter: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Also, the petition of Mary Kilbourn of Northfield, Mass. for a pension: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. Also, the petition of Adolphus Batchellor and sixty-one other citizens of Northbridge, Mass. praying for a Congress of Nations to establish a code of international law, and a High Court of Nations to decide on all cases of international difficulty: referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Also, the memorial of Joseph France and one hundred and twenty-five others, of Mendon, Mass.; of Edward Seagraves and twenty-eight others, of Oxbridge, Mass.; John Corey and others, of Foxb rough, Mass.; of Frederick W. Lincoln and fifty others, of Canton, Mass; of Mosses Buffum and others, of Mendon, Mass.; of James Adams and twenty-two others, of Canton, Mass.; of Anson Barton and twenty-three others, of Wrentham, Mass.; all representing the existence of frauds upon the revenue, and praying for an investigation of the same, and for a revision of the laws in relation to the collection of duties on manufactures of wool: referred to the Committee on Manufac ures.]

By Messrs. TILLINGHAST and CRANSTON, of Rhode Island.

By Messrs. BROCKWAY, TRUMBULL, STORRS, J. B. WILLIAMS, OSBORNE, and SMITH, of Connecticut.

By Messrs. HALL, SLADE, and FLETCHER, of Vermont.

By Messrs. MITCHELL, A. BROWN, WAGENER, STRONG, HAND, DOIG, MORGAN, HOFFMAN, FILLMORE, PECK, GRINNELL, CURTIS, GRANGER, CHAS. JOHNSON, GATES, FINE, BARNARD, KEMBLE, JONES, MARVIN, HUNT, CRITTENDEN, RUSSELL, MONROE, PRENTISS, DANA, VANDERPOEL, LEONARD, EARL, FLOYD, MALLORY, ROGERS, KEMPSHALL, JACKSON, EDWARDS, BREWSTER, and MONTANYA, of New York.

[Mr. MARVIN presented, and had properly referred, the following petitions: The petition of Joseph Hall for a pension as an invalid. The petition of General Putnam Farrington, of Chautauque county, New York, praying for a pension. The petition of Eunice Abell for a pension. The petition of A. Hitchcock, and others, for an increase of pension. Also, two petitions from sundry citizens of Chautauque county, New York, praying legislation in relation to the use of ardent spirits in the army and navy, &c. &c. Also, a letter in relation to the claim of Charles Wood, of Cattaraugus county, New York, for a pension, with a resolution that the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions inquire into the expediency of granting said Wood a pension. Mr. M. also presented the following petitions, which he said had been placed in his hands by the Hon. Mr. GALBRAITH, of Pennsylvania, not now in his seat, with a request to present them: Three petitions praying for an appropriation to improve the navigation of the Alleghany river from Pittsburgh to Olean. Petition of James Gee for a pension as an invalid. The petition of Casper M. Rause for remuneration, &c. for losses sustained by his father in the Revolutionary War. A petition praying for the construction of a harbor on Lake Erie, at the mouth of Sixteen Mile Creek, in Pennsylvania. The petition of citizens of Warren and Erie counties, Pennsylvania, praying for a post route from Waterford to Warren. The petition of D. Raymond, respecting the currency of the United States. The memorial of a convention of delegates from a number of counties in the western part of Pennsylvania, for an appropriation to improve the navigation of the Alleghany river.]

[Mr. PRENTISS presented the petition of Geo. H. Noble, and ninety-nine others, of Oswego county, New York, for a reduction in the rate of letter postage. Also, the petition of Joseph Peck, and one hundred and twenty-two others, of New Lisbon, Otsego county, New York, for the same object.]

[Mr. HAND presented the petition of Henry Watriss for relief on account of damages sustained by a sudden termination of a contract with the United States, to make, prepare, and fit the iron work for building a battery at Island Point, near the boundary line on Lake Champlain: referred to the Committee on Claims. Also, the petition of Chas. M. Hillyard, for pay for necessaries furnished the troops during the border troubles in 1838: referred to the Committee of Claims. Also, the petition of Daniel T. Taylor, for aid in establishing a national university in Missouri, Illinois, or one of the Western States: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Also, the petition of Archibald McCollum, for compensation for a house accidentally destroyed by fire when in the occupancy of the United States troops: referred to the Committee on Claims. Also, the petition of Lebbeus Hascall, stating that he is the inventor of certain hollow cannon shot, asking for trial by experiments, and, if found an improvement, then for compensation: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Also moved that the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be discharged from the consideration of the petition J. Cammack, and that it be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions: ordered. Also, that same committee be discharged from the consideration of the petition of Elizabeth Allen, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims: ordered.]

[Mr. LEONARD presented the petition of Samuel Hutchinson, a soldier of the Revolution, praying to be inscribed upon the pension roll. Also, a petition of inhabitants of the county of Tioga, in the State of New York, for the establishment of a mail route from Flemingville, in said county, to Speedsville, in the county of Tompkins. Also, the petition of the heirs of Capt. Thomas Park, deceased, praying compensation for private property sold for the use of the Government during the Revolutionary war.]

[Mr. STRONG of New York presented sundry petitions of inhabitants of the counties of Wayne and Ontario, in the State of New York, praying for an appropriation to aid in improving the harbor at Pulteneyville, on Lake Ontario: referred to the Committee on Commerce. Also, a petition of inhabitants of the county of Wayne, State of New York, praying that the franking privilege may be abolished, and that the rate of postage on each letter, not exceeding one-fourth of an ounce in weight, may be made uniform, without regard to distance, and be two cents: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Also, a petition of William Willcox and Joseph Willcox, of Palmyra, in the county of Wayne, State of New York, praying for relief: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Also, a petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of New York, praying for the establishment of a port of entry at Indian Key: referred to the Committee on Commerce.]

[Mr. HUNT presented the petition, with accompanying papers, of Polly Hall, widow and executrix of Lot Hall, deceased, as also of the heirs of the deceased, praying remuneration for services rendered by the said Lot Hall, and prize money due him, in the war of the Revolution: ordered to be printed, and referred, with the papers, to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. Also, the petition and accompanying papers of Thomas Thody, of Rensselaer county, New York, praying relief and remuneration for his unjust imprisonment in the State prison at Auburn, for the robbery of the United States mail, committed in May, 1835, by one John C. Riley: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.]

[Mr. PECK presented the following petitions, viz: George Williams and others, of Portage, Allegany county, New York, for the establishment of a mail route; William Parker, a Seneca Indian, for an increase of pension; Samuel Gilman, of Genesee county, New York, for relief, by pension or otherwise, on account of Revolutionary services.]

[On motion of Mr. JONES,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of an act to establish a post route from Newburg, by way of Brook's Mills and Lagrange, to South Middletown, in Orange county, N. Y.

On motion of Mr. JONES, the resolution in reference to "Jones's Digest and Tariff," and the report thereon, February 13, 1839, were referred to the Committee on Commerce.]

[Mr. MONTANYA presented the petition of James Stephens, Leah Tenure, Rachel Polhamus, John Sidman, and Jonathan Youman, praying to be placed on the roll of Revolutionary pensions. Also, the petition of John Blight and others, master workmen at naval stations, for increase of pay. Also, two separate petitions from inhabitants of Brooklyn and New York, for the construction of a national dry-dock at Brooklyn. Also, a petition of two hundred and three mechanics of the Brooklyn naval station, for an early appropriation for the completion of works already commenced; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.]

When New Jersey was called,

Mr RANDOLPH inquired of the SPEAKER whether he had received a communication from the Governor and Council of New Jersey on the subject of the contested elections from that State.

The SPEAKER replied that he had received such a communication, but that it was addressed to him in his individual capacity as a Representative from the State of Virginia, and not in his official character as SPEAKER of the House, and therefore he had declined presenting it.

Mr. PICKENS said he should like to hear the SPEAKER's answer to the communication read.

Mr. WISE said the answer was a personal affair, solely belonging the SPEAKER, because the communication of the Governor and Council was addressed to him in his private character, and therefore it was not necessary for him to ask the advice of the House in answering it. But inasmuch as it was a correspondence between the authorities of a sovereign State and a high officer of that House, he hoped it would be laid before them.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he felt bound, at the first opportunity, to present these resolutions himself, and he would therefore do so now, and move that they be spread upon the journal, and printed.

Mr. JAMESON asked of the CHAIR, if these resolutions had not first been addressed to him as an individual member of the House.

The SPEAKER replied that he had received certain resolutions from the Governor and Council of New Jersey, but as they were not addressed to him in his official character as SPEAKER of the House he had declined presenting them.

Mr. HAND doubted whether it was in order to present these resolutions at this time. The extension of the 20th rule authorized the presentation of petitions; but he did not think resolutions of a State could come in under that rule.

Mr. JAMESON wished to know of the CHAIR if the report and resolutions of the minority of the Legislature of New Jersey on the same subject, had been received by him; and if so, whether he would lay them before the House.

The SPEAKER replied that he had received a report from the minority of the New Jersey Legislature, which was addressed to him in his official character, as Speaker of the House of Representatives; and he would, therefore, at a proper time, present them.

Mr. PICKENS apprehended that the gentleman from New York was mistaken in his construction of the rule. It would apply, he said, to resolutions offered by the members from themselves, but not to resolutions coming from one of the States. Such had always been received when petitions were in order.

Mr. HAND then withdrew his objections.

Mr. R. GARLAND asked if he understood the SPEAKER as saying that he would present the report coming from the minority of the New Jersey Legislature, while he declined presenting a communication from the Governor and Council of that State.

Mr. WISE said that if gentlemen would permit the correspondence to be read, they would not only understand the motives of the SPEAKER, but would approve of his conduct. The one set of resolutions was addressed to him as a member from the State of Virginia, and denied the organization of the House, and that he was the Speaker of it. He could not, therefore, consistently with the respect he owed the House, or in justice to himself, have presented these resolutions. The other set, which came from the minority of the Legislature, was addressed to him in his official character, and therefore, it was right and proper that he should present them.

Mr. DROMGOOLE contended that the correspondence ought to be laid before the House, in order to set the conduct of the SPEAKER in its proper light. This, he thought, was due, as well to the SPEAKER as to the House.

Mr. HOLMES expressed the same views; and after some further remarks from Messrs. DROM-

GOOLE, LINCOLN, PETRIKIN, WISE, BRIGGS, F. THOMAS, and LEADBETTER,

Mr. WISE moved a suspension of the rules, in order to enable the SPEAKER to lay the communication and his answer before the House. But before taking any question,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, February 6, 1840.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in compliance with resolutions of the Senate of the 30th December last, in relation to tolls collected on vessels passing through the Louisville and Portland canal; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Also, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting fifty-two copies of the Army Register for the year 1840, which was read.

Mr. ROANE presented the memorial of Nancy Hickman; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PIERCE presented the memorial of Colonel Many, and other officers of the 3d regiment of infantry, praying that the officers of the line of the army may be placed upon the same footing, in point of pay, with the officers of the several staff corps.

Mr. P. said he desired to remark here, in reply to many inquiries that had been propounded to him upon this subject, that the Committee on Military Affairs would soon report a bill for the equalization of the pay of the officers of the army, agreeably to the instructions of a resolution which he had the honor to submit at an early day of the session, and which was adopted by the Senate, without a dissenting voice.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented the memorial of a number of masters of steamboats, and others, of New Orleans, praying the establishment of lights, for rendering more easy the navigation between the cities of New Orleans and Mobile; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PHELPS presented the petition of John S. Morton and John Larrabee; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. YOUNG submitted documents in relation to the claim of Robert K. McLaughlin; which were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. BENTON submitted a document containing the annual payments on account of the public debt, and the revenue from customs and sales of public lands in each year, from 1789 to 1839; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the memorial of Ramsay McHenry; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. PIERCE, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the memorial of Benjamin L. Carleton, and it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Samuel Crapin, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. P. also, from the same committee, to which was referred

The petition of Abraham White;

The memorial of Wareham Kingsley; and

A document relating to the claim of James T. Chittenden; made, severally, adverse reports on the same.

On motion by Mr. BETTS, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Hannah Gouge, and from the further consideration of the memorial of Thomas Harrison.

Mr. BETTS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Jeremiah Fugitt, made an adverse report thereon.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the execution of the thirteenth and fourteenth sections of the act to regulate the deposites of the public money;

The memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Wisconsin, praying for an appropriation for the erection of a penitentiary, and asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be laid upon the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. LINN submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to send to the Senate his opinion of the expediency of establishing a line of military posts at suitable places and distances from the Missouri river, near the mouth of the Platte, into the pass or passes of the Rocky mountains most usually traversed to descend into the valley of the Oregon or Columbia river; the effects of such a measure in giving encouragement and protection to the American fur trader; facilitating intercourse between the valley of the Mississippi and the great western ocean; aiding and protecting trading caravans; overawing and holding in check various Indian tribes, in front and rear of such posts; the number and kind of force necessary for such service; the probable cost of keeping up said posts; and whether it would be necessary to increase the military force of the United States to accomplish these objects.

Mr. LINN submitted the following motion, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the pension laws, as to authorize the Commissioners of Pensions to pay to the administrator or administrators on the estate of a pensioner, where the widow is dead, the amount coming to the children of the deceased, but, at the same time, not to make this fund liable for the debts of the deceased.

Mr. HUBBARD submitted documents in the claim of Gershom Morse; which, with a resolution, was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The resolution submitted some days since by Mr. TAPPAN, to amend the joint rules in relation to petitions, was taken up, and ordered to be printed.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, after being amended on motion of Mr. SMITH of Indiana, was considered and agreed to—ayes 30, noes 5.

The bill for the relief of Charles Morgan, after being amended, and changing its title to "A bill for the relief of Susannah Honeyman, her heirs or assigns;"

The bill to amend the "act to provide for taking the sixth census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, approved March 3, 1839;"

The bill to authorize John E. Metcalf, and others, to locate certain pre-emption claims to land in Indiana; were severally considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. PRESTON moved that the orders of the day be suspended, and the resolution submitted by him some days since be taken up for consideration.

On this motion a debate sprung up, in which Messrs. PRESTON, KING, BROWN, ROBINSON, CRITTENDEN, SMITH of Indiana, NORVELL, WHITE, WRIGHT, and CLAY of Alabama participated.

When, on motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama, it was laid on the table—ayes 25, noes 15.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, February 6, 1840.

The SPEAKER begged leave to make a short explanation this morning, in relation to the subject which was under discussion yesterday evening. It had been suggested yesterday by several gentlemen, that it was probably due to himself, and to the relations he bore to the House, that he should explain the reasons which induced him to decline presenting the communication he received from the Governor and Council of New Jersey. If it should be the pleasure, therefore, of the House, he would desire to lay the correspondence referred to before it. This course would, perhaps, tend to put an end to unnecessary debate, and do away with the necessity of suspending the rules, as moved by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.]

The correspondence was then read, as follows:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Trenton, Jan. 24, 1840.

SIR: I herewith transmit a copy of a preamble and resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey at their present session, and request that you will lay the same before the Representatives of the Twenty-sixth Congress from the several States, now assembled at Washington.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM PENNINGTON,
Governor of New Jersey.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVE OF THE U. S.
Washington, January 30, 1840.

To his Excellency Gov. PENNINGTON:

SIR: I have received, through you, the resolutions of the Council and General Assembly of New Jersey, a copy of which was ordered to be transmitted to "the Hon. R. M. T. HUNTER, a Representative from the State of Virginia, with the request that he will lay the same before the other Representatives from the several States now assembled at Washington." As an individual, or as a member from the State of Virginia, I should always esteem it a distinguished honor to be selected as the organ through whom the sovereign State of New Jersey might be pleased to express its wishes and opinions. But, as I have no right to suppose that the Council and General Assembly of New Jersey have designed thus to distinguish me individually, and to the exclusion of the honorable member from that State, who, with others, constitute the present House of Representatives, I feel bound to conclude, upon this consideration and from the general tenor of the resolutions themselves, that they were sent to me on account of the station which I at present occupy. Under these circumstances, I beg leave most respectfully to decline to lay these resolutions before the House over which I have the honor to preside, as, virtually, they seem to deny my title to the office of Speaker, and the right of those who have invested me with that trust.

The House of Representatives of the United States of America having elected a Speaker, has a right to expect that all communications made to it through its organ, should be addressed to him in his official capacity. Under this view of the case, it would seem that I cannot comply with the request of the Council and General Assembly of New Jersey, with a due regard to the dignity of the House, or without admitting by reference that it had conferred upon me authority which it had no right to give, and that I myself am discharging the functions of an office to which I have no title. These are admissions which I am not prepared to make.

In thus stating my views in reference to the request made of me, I raise no question as to the propriety of the resolutions themselves, or as to the right of the Council and General Assembly of New Jersey to adopt them. I only refer to them as they relate to my official station, to show that I am influenced by no want of respect for the constituted authorities of the State of New Jersey, but governed entirely by a sense of duty to the House of which I am the organ, and which may expect that I shall not lay before them communications which refuse to accredit me as such. I am not disposed to cavil about mere matters of form, nor do I imagine that a personal disrespect was inended to be offered to me by those, whose station and dignity alike forbid such a supposition. But when an omission of form seems designed as a mode of denying the rights and privileges of the House of Representatives, of which I am the organ, it becomes my duty to do nothing which may recognise the propriety of such an omission.

I have retained the copy of the resolutions transmitted to me, until I shall be further advised by your Excellency of any other disposition which it may be proposed to make of them.

In conclusion, I beg leave to express my request that I should be unable to comply with any regret made of me by the Council and General Assembly of New Jersey.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant, R. M. T. HUNTER.

Mr. RANDOLPH observed that he did not hear the objections made yesterday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. If he had heard the gentleman, he would have replied to them. The fifty-fourth rule, Mr. R. said, was applicable to petitions and memorials only, and not to resolutions coming from a sovereign State. He did not think, therefore, that they should be laid over, by the operations of this rule.

The SPEAKER suggested to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] that he had better withdraw his motion to suspend the rules, the object having been accomplished by laying the correspondence before the House.

Mr. WISE said his only object, on yesterday, in pressing the motion that the SPEAKER be permitted to give his reasons, was to enable that gentleman to place himself right before the country. His object was attained by the reading of the correspondence, which would be placed on the journal. That correspondence gave satisfactory reasons for the course the SPEAKER had pursued; and he deemed his motion now unnecessary, and withdrew it.

The SPEAKER then informed the gentleman from New Jersey, that the resolutions were before the House on the motion to print them.

Mr. LEADBETTER rose to a question affecting the journal, and stated that, after what had transpired on yesterday in relation to the presentation of the joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, he should move to strike out the entry made in that case, and to insert the following as an amendment:

"Mr. RANDOLPH inquired of the SPEAKER if he had received certain joint resolutions from the Governor and Council of the State of New Jersey; and if so, did the SPEAKER intend to present them? And if the SPEAKER did not intend to present them, did the CHAIR wish to state his reasons for refusing to present them?

"The SPEAKER replied that he had received certain resolutions from the Governor and Council, addressed to him as a member of the House, and not as SPEAKER; that he should not present them, and had so informed the Governor and Council.

"Mr. RANDOLPH. Then I will present them, and move to have them spread upon the journal.

"Mr. LEADBETTER objected, as being out of order.

"The CHAIR stated, that by the practice of the House, the resolutions were in order.

"Mr. HAND rose to the same question of order; and, during a desultory debate, when Mr. RANDOLPH was called upon to either state the contents of the resolution, or to have them read.

"Mr. RANDOLPH replied, let them be read.

"Mr. DROMGOOLE rose, and objected to the reception, and should continue to do so, until the SPEAKER should state his reasons for not presenting those resolutions."

Mr. L. stated that this amendment had been hastily drawn up, and would of course be subject to corrections wherein it might differ from the facts. But, said Mr. L. permit me here to state, that if those resolutions had found their way upon the journals of this House, in accordance with its rules, an amendment of the journal would not have been called for by me; but justice to myself, to the House, and to the country, seem to require that the journal should be its own expositor of the way and manner in which those resolutions found their way upon them. Let those resolutions be couched in language ever so respectful—let them have emanated from a sovereign State or elsewhere, I insist that, inasmuch as they came not in under the prescribed rules of the House, "but climbed up some other way," it is but just, right, and proper, that the journals should present the facts of the case. I will here inquire how those resolutions came there, and if I am wrong, I hope that some gentleman will correct me.

After the honorable member from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH,] had imparled with the SPEAKER, he presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of his State, and moved that they be spread upon the journal; to which I objected, being informed by the SPEAKER that resolutions and memorials from the Legislatures of the States had, by the former practice of the House, been always considered as in order upon petition days. The honorable member from New Jersey was then called upon, either to state the contents of the resolutions, or to have them read; to which he replied, "Let them be read." During this call, an honorable member from New York, [Mr. HAND,] rose to the same point of order, received and the same information from the CHAIR that I had. During a desultory debate, whether the SPEAKER should assign to the House his reason for refusing to present the resolutions, an honorable member from Virginia, over the way, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] obtained the floor, and objected to their reception, and said he would continue to do so until the SPEAKER should be permitted to state his reasons for the refusal, if he desired so to do.

This motion to reject was not withdrawn; yet I understand that the CHAIR decided that the resolutions were received, in which, with all due respect for the CHAIR, I then thought, and still think, that the CHAIR erred; but this decision being made, I felt myself constrained to put myself and the matter right before the country; and before a petition, memorial, or resolution, can be received by this House, it must either be read for the information of the House, or its contents briefly stated. Now, sir, I ask was this done? Who heard them either read or their contents stated? Who among us even now knows what those resolutions contained? How do we know but what they are in direct violation of the rule adopted by this House, a few days ago, in relation to the subject of Abolition? How do we know, sir, but they contain direct propositions for the immediate abolishment of slavery in the District of Columbia? Did you hear them read? Did you hear a brief statement of their contents? No, sir. No. Then, sir, before the power of the rule requiring that they should be either read, or a statement of their contents briefly made, had exhausted itself, the objection to the reception was made by the gentleman from Virginia, and not withdrawn. Then, sir, how stand the facts of the case? Simply thus: that we have spread upon our journals preambles, resolutions, &c. &c. of which we know nothing, except from dame rumor, and that at a time when the House were resting, insecurely, under the apprehension that the quesiton of reception was still before us.

Although these resolutions are upon the journal, (the reading of that part of which is dispensed with,) yet, sir, suppose that it shall appear hereafter that those resolutions are intended as a direct insult to this body, and we shall be compelled to hear the record of our own disgrace heralded forth to the world, how much more does the justice and propriety of this amendment to the journal present itself to our consideration? Nor this alone—let the same journal, which bears the record of our disgrace, also transmit to posterity the way and manner in which this disgrace came upon the record.

Mr. REED hoped that part of the gentleman's motion would not be adopted. The gentleman was for putting on the journal a desultory debate, verifying the old adage, that there might be "too much of a good thing." This reminded him of an anecdote he had heard relating to a circumstance that took place in the old Plymouth colony. A man there was punished by whipping for some trifling crime; and, when putting on his jacket to go away, was told by the judge to come back and pay a shilling for recording. The culprit answered, that he did not care whether they recorded it or not. Mr. R. concluded by moving to lay the motion of Mr. LEADBETTER on the table.

Mr. JONES of New York demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. TILLINGHAST inquired of the CHAIR whether it had not been the invariable practice, in making up the journal, to insert thereon the joint resolutions passed by State Legislatures.

The SPEAKER said the journal, as it now stood, was in the usual form.

Mr. BEATTY inquired if it had been usual to insert on the journal resolutions of the States couched in improper language, and denying the organization of the House. Mr. B. denied that such was the practice, and was proceeding to debate that point, but was called to order by

The SPEAKER, who said the motion to lay on the table was not debatable.

Mr. BEATTY. I am sorry that the gag had been applied in this case. He wished it could be debated.

The yeas and nays were then ordered on the motion to lay on the table; and were—yeas 87, nays 86.

So it was laid on the table.

The question then recurring on the motion to print,

Mr. STEENROD demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 94, nays 92.

Petitions and memorials were then further presented,

By Mr. RANDOLPH, of New Jersey.

The SPEAKER presented the report of the minority of the Joint Committee of the Legislature of New Jersey, approving of the course of the House of Representatives in excluding from seats the spurious members returned from that State.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that it be laid on the table and be printed.

Mr. BEATY called for the reading of the report; which was proceeded in for a short time, when

Mr. DANA moved that the reading be dispensed with.

Mr. BEATTY persisted in having it read. It was a courtesy due to the House that, after the majority report had been read, the minority also should be read.

Mr. DAVIES of Pennsylvania objected to the reading; when

Mr. BEATTY demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the reading, but subsequently withdrew it.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend, and decided in the affirmative, without a count.

Mr. CRARY said the CHAIR had decided that it had been usual to place on the journal resolutions of State Legislatures; but he believed that rule had been departed from in some instances; therefore, for fear that the resolutions might or might not be placed there, he moved to amend the motion to lay on the table, and print, by adding, and that the same be spread on the journal.

Mr. R. GARLAND inquired if it was in order to amend a motion to lay on the table.

Mr. PETRIKIN inquired of the CHAIR whether, if the yeas and nays be ordered on the motion to lay on the table and print, the resolutions would not be also inserted on the journal.

The SPEAKER. According to the usual practice, they would.

Mr. CRARY withdrew his motion to amend, as the object he had in view to get it spread on the journal could be accomplished in another way.

Mr. TURNEY then demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 155, nays 1.

So the motion to print and lie on the table prevailed.

Petitions and memorials were then presented by Messrs. DAVIES, PETRIKIN, RAMSEY, BEATTY, HENRY, NAYLOR, JAMES, SARGEANT, S. W. MORRIS, KEIM, LEET, McCULLOH, SIMONTON, EDWARDS, NEWHARD, BIDDLE, PAYNTER, OGLE, and COOPER, of Pennsylvania, and also by the SPEAKER, from citizens of that State.

[Mr. HENRY presented the following petitions: The petition of Thomas Stratton, of Beaver county, Pennsylvania, a soldier of the Revolution, praying for remuneration for services in the Revolutionary war: on motion, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. Of John Spear, of Mercer county, Pennsylvania, praying to be placed on the pension list on account of services in the Indian war, under General Wayne, by which his health was impaired, and is now old and poor, and unable to support himself by labor: on motion, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Of Robert Dock, praying for remuneration for losses sustained in the Revolutionary war: referred to the Committee of Claims. Of Josiah Westlake, of Mercer county, Pennsylvania, praying for an additional pension, which has been withheld from him from March 4, 1824, to September 4, 1831: referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Of Thomas Hall, of Beaver county, Pennsylvania, a soldier of the Revolutionary war, praying to be placed on the pension list on account of Revolutionary services: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. Of John Killinger, of Mercer county, Pennsylvania, a soldier in the late war, praying to be placed on the pension roll in consequence of loss of health, occasioned by exposure in the service of his country: referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Two petitions of a number of citizens of Mercer county, and one from Beaver county, Pennsylvania, praying for the recognition, by the Government of the United States, of the independence of Hayti, and for the establishment of diplomatic and commercial relations with that Republic: laid on the table. The memorial of the American Silk Society, praying that the Journal of the American Silk Society and Rural Economist may be patronized, and circulated among the American people free of expense: referred to the Committee on Manufactures. The memorial of one hundred and forty-eight citizens of Beaver county, Pennsylvania, engaged in the manufacture of woollen goods, praying Congress to pass a law to prevent frauds being committed against the revenue laws, and to protect manufactures: referred to the Committee on Manufactures. Two remonstances of a number of citizens of Mercer county, Pennsylvania, against the annexation of Texas to this Union: laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. HENRY,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for issuing land scrip to satisfy military bounty land warrants, or make such other immediate provision for all cases of outstanding military or Revolutionary land warrants, for the satisfaction of which there remain no lands appropriated, as said committee may deem expedient.]

[Mr. KEIM presented the following: petition from the electors of the third District, asking an investigation into the right of CHARLES NAYLOR, holding a seat in Congress: referred to the Committee of Elections. Of Horatio N. Crabb, late a first Lieutenant of Marines, asking a restoration of pay and allowances, withheld from him under a decision of the accounting officers of the Treasury: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Of citizens of city and county of Philadelphia, praying that a steam revenue cutter may be constructed for the public service in Delaware bay: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. From one hundred citizens of Berks county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to establish a post route from Douglassville to Hamburg, in county and State aforesaid: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.]

[Mr. RAMSEY presented the following petitions: Of the citizens of Adams county, Pennsylvania, for the establishment of a post route from Gettysburg to Hanover, via McSherrystown. Of Capt. Jno. Smith, claiming for Revolutionary services. Of Lieutenant Scott Ketchum of the United States army, for relief. Of the heirs of Mathew Armon, deceased, for relief.]

[Mr. S. W. MORRIS presented the petition of sundry inhabitants of Tioga county, Pennsylvania, asking for the establishment of a post road from Lawrenceville to Southport. Of Edward Lilly, a soldier in the last war, praying for a pension.]

[Mr. PETRIKIN presented the following petitions: Of Jonathan Bulkley of Luzerne county, Pa. praying Congress to grant him a pension for injuries received while in the serivce of the United States Navy: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Of John Atherton for a pension for services rendered in the Revolutionary war: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. Of Abbott Green and George Schnalle, praying that money deposited by them in the Treasury of the United States to purchase lands be refunded to them: referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. Of Daniel P. Rake for a law to authorize a location of military land warrant: referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. Of S. Raub, jr. relative to his invention to prevent accidents by the bursting of steam boilers on board of ships and boats: referred to a Select Committee of Seven. Of Charles Hickman and eighty-two other citizens and electors resident in the Third Congressional District of Pennsylvania, contesting the right of CHARLES NAYLOR to a seat in the House of Representatives: referred to the Committee on Elections.]

[Mr. LEET said he had in his hand a memorial signed by Joseph Henderson of the county of Washington, in the State of Pennsylvania, who is one of the heirs and attorney in fact for the other heirs of Richard Dallinor, late of the State of Delaware, deceased. The petition sets forth that R. Dallinor, in the capacity of captain, in the militia in the State of Delaware, served during the whole of the Revolutionary war, and requests that the petitioners may be allowed five years' pay and the usual quantity of land granted to captains in the continental army: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.]

[Mr. OGLE presented the following petitions: From Edwin F. Shoenberger, and others, of Bedford county, Pa. to revise the laws for the collection of duties, and make them more effectual in preventing frauds. From Daniel Young and others, of same county, and State, of similar import. From Robert Graham of Westmoreland county, Penn. to confirm his right to certain lands in Illinois. Petition of Clayton and Mitchell, of the county of Franklin, Va. asking to be paid arrears of pension of Wm. Kemplin, deceased, a Revolutionary soldier: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. Petition of John Murcheson, of Campbell county, Va. praying compensation for Revolutionary services: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.]

[On motion of Mr. GARLAND of Virginia,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Pedlar Mills, in the county of Amherst, to Fairfield, in the county of Rockbridge, in the State of Virginia.]

[Mr. J. JOHNSON presented a petition praying for the establishment of the following post routes in the State of Virginia: From Beverly, in the county of Randolph, to Evansville, in the county of Preston; from Huttonsville, in the county of Randolph, to Cocklytown, in the county of Pocahontas; from Jacksonville, in the county of Wood, to Arnoldsburg, in the county of Lewis. Of John Thompson, Neil Shannon, Peter Ambler, and Joseph Cubberly, asking to be placed on the list of invalid pensions. Of Adam Flesher, an old soldier, praying to be released from a judgment obtained against him in the United States court for the western district of Virginia.]

Mr. BANKS, on Thursday last, presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Virginia below, and moved the following order on the same:

Ordered, That the said resolutions be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of making an additional appropriation of land to satisfy the outstanding military bounty land warrants issued, under the authority of the Commonwealth of Virginia, to the officers and soldiers of the Revolution, or their legal representatives.

Resolved by the General Assembly, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, to use their best exertions to procure from Congress an additional appropriation of land to satisfy the outstanding military bounty land warrants issued, under the authority of this Commonwealth, to the officers and soldiers of the Revolution, or their legal representatives.

Resolved, That the Governor of the Commonwealth be requested to transmit a copy of the above resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

By Messrs. STANLY and GRAHAM, of North Carolina.

By Messrs. S. H. BUTLER, W. THOMPSON, and HOLMES, of South Carolina.

By Messrs. MARK A. COOPER, HABERSHAM, WARREN, and DAWSON, of Georgia.

[Mr. DAWSON presented two petitions, one of which had been presented to the last Congress, from James S. Calhoun of the city of Columbus, Georgia, asking remuneration for losses and damages sustained by the acts of the military officers and authorized agents of the General Government, by impressing his property for the public use, and violating, for the public interest, certain contracts solemnly entered into between the said James S. Calhoun and the Government: referred to the Committee of Claims, with the accompanying documents. One from Gen. Duncan L. Clinch of St. Mary's, Georgia, asking pay for supplies furnished, taken, and used by the officers and soldiers of the General Government belonging to Gen. Clinch during the Florida campaign: referred, with the accompanying evidence, to the Committee of Claims. One from John M. Of the Rev. A. A. Muller, claiming commutation and bounty land, as the sole heir and representative of Major Muller, the aid-de-camp of General Marion: which was referred to a select committee of seven members.]

By Messrs. STARKWEATHER, RIDGWAY, MASON, BOND, WELLER, DOANE, TAYLOR, HASTINGS, PARISH, DUNCAN, SWEENY, GIDDINGS, and GOODE, of Ohio.

By Messrs. CHINN, R. GARLAND, and WHITE, of Louisiana.

By Messrs. DAVIS, RARIDEN, WICK, T. SMITH, CARR, HOWARD, and PROFFIT, of Indiana.

[Mr. DAVIS of Indiana presented the petition of the Bishop of Vincennes, asking a repeal of duty on a church bell. Of sundry citizens of Indiana, asking a pension for Ambrose Manes, accompanied by testimony. For a mail route from Washington to Petersburg, Indiana. Also, the memorial of the National Road Convention, held at Terre Haute, Indiana, in July, 1839.]

Mr. DAVIS moved that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CASEY moved to amend the motion to refer, by adding the following: "And that said committee be instructed to report a bill, making an appropriation of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars for each of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to be expended on the national road in said States, in the year 1840, under the direction of the War Department; said appropriation to be subject to all the restrictions and conditions of former appropriations on said road.

This motion having been objected to as out of order at that time,

Mr. CASEY maintained that it was in order, and that it was perfectly competent at any time to move instructions to a committee on any subject committed to its charge.

This motion having elicited debate, under the rule, lies over one day. The petition, however, was ordered to be printed.

[Mr. CARR presented the petition of Wm. H. Swan, and 129 others, who represent that, in the surveying and laying off Congressional township two, north of range nine east, of the Jeffersonville Indiana land district, into sections and quarter sections, two parallel lines east and west seem to have been run, and all the entries have been made by the south line, the numbers being on that line, but by the field notes the corners are some on the north and some on the south parallel lines; accompanying which petition is the plot or map of said township, made by the county surveyor of Jefferson county—petitioners ask Congress, if it be proper, to declare and provide that the south of the two parallel lines be deemed and taken as the true and correct division line. A remonstrance, signed by A. H. Harris, and 14 others, objecting to all interference on the part of Congress in regard to the survey lines and field notes of Congressional township two north, of range nine east; accompanying said remonstrance is a certificate of the county surveyor of Clark county, coinciding with the views set forth in the remonstrance: all of which, the petition, remonstrance, and accompanying papers, were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The petition of Davis Shockly, praying for a pension: which was, upon his motion, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. Of James Smallwood, of Indiana, praying to be placed on the invalid pension roll: which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The papers of Zalmon Burrett, asking a pension: which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. On motion of Mr. C. the petition of Indian Robin, or Robin Loyd, praying a pension, was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary pensions. Mr. C. also presented the memorial and joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, on the subject of constructing a canal around the falls of the Ohio river, on the Indiana side, sufficient for the passage of the largest class of steamboats: which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals. He also presented the petition of Almon Baldwin, and 350 others, on the same subject: which was referred to the same committee.]

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of a number of the citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, praying an increase of duties on foreign silks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of William Hawkins.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which the subject was referred, reported a bill concerning a seminary of learning in the Territory of Iowa; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the relief of John H. Sheppard, administrator of Abiel Wood; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. W. in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of John E. Bispham; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TAPPAN, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in the following bill, which was ordered to be printed:

A BILL

To regulate the issuing and circulating of bank paper in the district of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act, if any person or persons shall establish or continue any bank in the District of Columbia, such person or persons shall first deposite in the office of the Recorder of Deeds for the county in which such bank may be established, a schedule, in writing, containing the names and places of residence of each and every stockholder in such bank, with the number and value of the shares by him or her held, and shall cause the same to be recorded with the record of deeds in the office, and shall also publish said schedule in two of the newspapers having the most general circulation in the District, three calendar months; and every sale or transfer of stock in such bank, within ten days after such transfer shall have been made, shall be placed upon record and published in like manner, by such person or persons so establishing or continuing such bank.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be unlawful for any individual banker or banking company, or for any other person or company, to issue any bank notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars, or by any art, shift, or device, to issue and put in circulation any paper, certificate, check, order, or note whatsoever, to circulate as currency, of a less denomination than twenty dollars; and any person or persons offending herein, shall forfeit and pay not less than five hundred dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars, for each and every note, order, check, or certificate, so issued and put in circulation as aforesaid; one half of the same to be for the use of the person prosecuting therefor, and the residue for the use of the county where the banking house of such individual banker or banking company shall be located, to be recovered by action of debt in any court having jurisdiction thereof.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if at any time, in usual banking hours, the paper of such individual or company shall be presented to such individual or company, or any officer by him or them employed, at their banking house or office, and payment demanded of the same, and payment thereof in gold or silver shall be refused, or unreasonably delayed, the holder of such note may make affidavit of such demand and refusal or delay, before any justice of the peace of the proper county, whereupon, the said justice shall issue his summons against such individual, or any officer or partner in such company, to be and appear before him, or some other justice of the peace, at a time to be stated in said summons, which time shall be within twenty-four hours from and after the same shall have been issued, then and there to show cause why judgment should not be entered against such individual, officer, or partner, for the amount of said note; and unless the party defendant in said writ shall appear, and plead that the note upon which suit is brought is not the note of such individual or company, or that legal and proper demand of payment has not been made, and verify such plea by the oath of the said defendant, or his agent or attorney, it shall be the duty of the justice to enter up a judgment against such defendant for the amount of such note, with costs of suit, and to issue his execution, as in other cases therefor.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, after the taking effect of this act, pass, or offer to pass, any bank note of a less denomination than twenty dollars, otherwise than in payment to a bank or banking company, such person shall forfeit and pay double the amount of such note, for the use of the person sueing for the same, to be recovered by action of debt before any magistrate having jurisdiction thereof.

The resolution submitted some days since by Mr. PRESTON, in relation to the Cumberland road, was taken up, and after a long debate, in which it was supported by Messrs. PRESTON, WEBSTER, SMITH of Indiana, and MERRICK, and opposed by Messrs. BENTON, ALLEN, TAPPAN, KING, HUBBARD, and CLAY of Alabama, and after being modified, on the question of its adoption, the vote was—ayes 4, noes 39. So it was not adopted. Adjourned until Monday.

HOUSE OF REPREESNTATIVES,

FRIDAY, January 7, 1840.

Mr. J. W. JONES, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, asked that the House would resolve itself Committee of the Whole to consider the bill making appropriations for Revolutionary and other pensioners. The pensions are payable half-yearly, on 4th of March and September, and unless the House would take some immediate action on this bill, it would be impossible for the Secretary of the Treasury to place the funds in the hands of disbursing agents at the various sections of the country where payment is made to the pensioners. The House would see the troubles and difficulties in which these old pensioners would be placed if the necessary funds were not in the hands of the agents to pay them, after they had made long journeys, with the expectation of receiving payment at the time specified by law. He hoped there would be no objection.

Mr. PICKENS suggested to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means the propriety of receiving reports till the hour of one o'clock; and, at that time, go into committee on this bill. There were very many important reports to be made from committees, which he hoped would be received.

Mr. EVANS objected to any departure from the rules. Such departures, experience ttaught him, had always embarrassed rather than facilitated the business of the House. He would, for that reason vote against all motions to suspend the rules. He hoped they would be adhered to, and that the States would be called for petitions.

Mr. PICKENS said petitions had been called from the States for two days past; and if they go on to receive them again to-day, he feared discussion might arise which would prevent the committees from having any opportunity to make reports. He hoped the House would agree to receive reports; and that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would yield to this suggestion, to go into committee at 1 o'clock.

Mr. JONES said the bill required the speedy action of the House; but he was willing to yield to the suggestion of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS.] Mr. J. was proceeding in his remarks, when

Mr. R. GARLAND called him to order.

Mr. JONES modified his motion, so that the House at 1 o'clock proceed to the consideration of the bill in committee.

Mr. DAWSON inquired of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether the funds to meet these pensioners were not appropriated one year in advance, and whether there was not a sufficient sum of the old appropriations in the hands of disbursing agents, to meet the payments necessary to be made in March.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected to his answering the question, or any debate, as it was entirely out of order.

Mr. JONES said he would answer the gentleman's question; when he was again called to order. He then moved a suspension of the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. BELL hoped the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] would be permitted to answer the interrogatory put to him by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON.] It had been the invariable practice of the House for such questions to be put and answered; and in fact the public business could not be transacted without it.

The SPEAKER said such had been the usual practice of the House, and was no doubt a convenient one; strictly speaking, however, debate was not in order.

Mr. PETRIKIN said his only objection arose from the fact of debates being permitted in one case, and not in another. If one gentleman was permitted to speak out of order, the same liberty might be claimed by all, and thus entirely obstruct the regular business of the House.

Mr. JONES, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Georgia, said he believed that it was the usual practice of the Department to forward these funds in advance, but how far, as to time, he was not advised. From looking, however, at the amount of unexpended balances, as shown by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, he inferred that it was not possible that funds to provide for all the accruing pensions could be at the points where they are to be paid; for, if every dollar of these unexpended balances were there, there would still not be more than half what was necessary. There were unexpended balances at some of the points, but to meet the payments at all of them in time, it was necessary that this appropriation should be speedily passed.

The yeas and nays having been ordered on the question of suspension, were—yeas 119, nays 40.

Mr. JONES then moved that the House go into the Committee of the Whole at one o'clock, for the purpose of taking up the bill making appropriations for the payment of the Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana called for the reading of the statement made by the Commissioner of Pensions, in order to show the amount of the unexpended balances

Mr. JONES said he stated to the House that there was a large amount of unexpended balances under one head of appropriations, but that the amount would not pay much more than one-half of the pensions acording.

Mr. GARLAND said, if the gentleman would look at the documents, he would find that the pension agents were most generally banking institutions and favorites of the Government; and that they had in their hands about one million four hundred thousand dollars to apply to the payment of these pensions.

Mr. TURNEY called for the previous question, but the call was not seconded.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana then read a report of the Commissioner of Pensions, and said that from this report, it appeared that there was now one million four hundred thousand dollars in the hands of the agents, while one million only was wanted for each quarter's payment. Now the effort was made to set aside the regular business of the House, for the purpose of placing money in the hands of these agents in advance. It was notorious that these agents were banks and political favorites who had the use of the public money for months before it was wanted.

Mr. JONES of Virginia rose to correct the errors into which the gentleman from Louisiana had fallen. The gentleman supposed that these pensions were payable quarterly, which was not the fact. They were payable half yearly, one payment becoming due in March, and the other in September. Further, the amount of one million four hundred thousand dollars, now in the hands of the pension agent, was not enough to pay the pensions becoming due in March, while there was the payment coming due in September, that was necessary now to be provided for. Mr. J. then went into an estimate of the different heads under which pensions are to be paid, and the sums that will be required for them. But the gentleman's principal objection was, that this money would go into the hands of the banks and political favorites of the Government. This was the first time he had ever heard that the banks were the peculiar favorites of this Government, and an assertion like this, coming from a gentleman standing in the political relation the gentleman from Louisiana did to the Administration, was a little extraordinary. He did not know how the gentleman made out that the individuals who acted as pension agents were the favorites of the Administration, but if the gentleman would look at the list of agencies, he would find that the banks were a large proportion of them, and therefore it was the favorites of the gentleman and his party, and not of the Administration, that derived any benefits from these agencies.

Mr. SMITH of Maine wished to make one single statement in reply to the gentleman from Louisiana. The gentleman said that those who disbursed these pensions were either banks or the especial favorites of the Administration. Now he begged leave to inform him that the pension agent in the State of Maine was a thoroughgoing Hartford Convention Federalist.

Mr. PETRIKIN here called for the previous question; and the call being seconded by the House, the main question was put, and carried without a division.

Mr. PICKENS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the following resolutions, which were agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if in his opinion it be not incompatible with the public interests so to do, to communicate to this House any information in his possession respecting the condition of the citizens of the United States doing business during the past year in China, the state of the American trade in that country, and the interests of the people and commerce of the United States, as affected by the recent measures of the Chinese Government for the suppression of the contraband or forcible introduction of opium into China. Also, whether the British Government has given notice to that of the United States of a purpose to blockade the ports of China, or of other hostile intentions towards that Government, and any other information possessed by the Executive in relation to the above matters.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to transmit to this House a statement of the commerce and navigation between the United States and China, from 1821 to 1839 inclusive, exhibiting for each year the amount of specie, the value and description of manufactured articles, the value and description of other merchandise, and the total amount exported; the quantity and value of teas, the value of silk goods, the value of other merchandise, and the total amount imported; the number of ships, the amount of tonnage, and the number of seamen employed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, Senate bill, entitled "An act to cancel the bonds given to secure duties upon vessels and their cargoes employed in the whale fisheries, and to make registers lawful papers for such vessels," was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The hour of one o'clock having arrived, the House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. LINCOLN in the chair,) and took up for consideration the bill making appropriation for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensions for the year 1840.

Mr. R. GARLAND then went on to reply to some remarks made by Mr. SMITH of Maine, in which that gentleman had contradicted the assertion he made, that the pension agents were presidents of banks, or friends and partisans of the present Administration. In proof that his assertions were correct, he referred to the names of many agents, among the rest, that of Mr. Van Ness, president of the Bank of the Metropolis, and of Dr. Brockenbrough, president of the Bank of Virginia, and Philemon Dickerson, one of the claimants for a seat from the State of New Jersey.

Mr. RANDOLPH said the gentleman from Louisiana was mistaken. The pension agent was a different individual, and not the gentleman claiming a seat from that State.

Mr. GARLAND, after referring to the names of other agents, inquired of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether it was proposed to place the whole amount in the bill into the hands of the agents immediately.

Mr. J. W. JONES said he had supposed that the explanations he had already made would have satisfied all gentlemen. He was not very conversant as to the usage of the Department in that respect, nor did he know to what amount the agents were entitled for disbursing these funds. He had information to enable him to state positively at what time this money was transmitted to the agents; but he presumed when appropriations were made by Congress, it was sent to them in time to meet the obligations of the Government. It might be six months or less. The amount of balances on hand, according to the gentleman's own showing, was not sufficient by several hundred thousand dollars, even if the appropriations under the different heads should be aggregated, to pay the amount becoming due on the 4th of March. These balances are from appropriations under the several pension laws, to be specifically applied to the different classes, and he did not see, by existing laws, how the appropriations under one head could be applied to other objects. The estimates had been furnished and laid before the House, showing what was necessary to be done to meet the obligations of the Government. Mr. J. then went on to examine those estimates, and show that the balances on hand were not sufficient for that purpose.

Mr. BANKS rose to trouble the committe with a very few remarks. He understood that when a bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House, the object was to render it open for such amendments as might be necessary. He did not suppose, however, that any amendments would be offered, but that the committee would at once rise, and report the bill to the House. But before this was done, he wished to reply to an allusion that had been made by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GARLAND,] to a distinguished citizen of his State, who is the president of one of its banks. The gentleman said that Dr. Brockenbrough was the agent for paying pensions in Virginia, and derived certain advantages from the agency. Now the fact was, Dr. B. as an individual, had no more to do with it than the gentleman himself. The money was deposited in the bank of which he is president, and as president of the bank only has he any agency. When the agent for the purpose examined the claim of aRevolu'i nary pensioner, the agent, if the claim was passed, gave a check to the claimant or his constituted attorney for the amount due him, which check being presented, was paid at the counter of the bank, of which Dr. Brockenbrough was the president."

The debate was further continued by Messrs. MARVIN, HOLLEMAN, REED, and PETRIKIN, when

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana submitted the following amendment:

"Be it further enacted, That no money appropriated by this act shall be placed in the hands of pension agents more than one month before the day for the semi-annual payment of pensions."

After a further debate, in which Messrs. CRAIG, BEATTY, and SERGEANT, took part,

Mr. UNDERWOOD, after some remarks, submitted the following amendment to the amendment of Mr. GARLAND: to strike out and insert:

Each pension agent shall be allowed as compensation for his services —— per cent. on the amount of money disbursed by him: Provided, That no pension agent shall receive as compensation more than 1,500 dollars per annum.

Be it further enacted, That it shall be unlawful for any pension agent to use or apply to his own purposes, or to lend to any person or persons, or to suffer any person or persons to use, any part of the public moneys placed in his hands or subject to his control; and, if any pension agent shall violate the foregoing provisions of this section, he shall, upon conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction, undergo and suffer imprisonment for a period of time not less than one nor more than five years, at the discretion of the jury convicting the offender.

After a further debate, in which Messrs. LEET, THOMPSON of South Carolina, JONES of Virginia, BEATTY, RAMSEY, SERGEANT, BELL, CURTIS, and WHITE, took part,

The committee, without having taken any question, rose and reported progress; when,

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 8, 1840.

Several petitions, heretofore laid over under the rule, because of debate arising thereon, were disposed of.

The CHAIR announced that the first thing in order was the memorial presented by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DAVIS] of the National Road Convention, held at Terre Haute, Indiana, in July, 1839, the question being on his motion to refer the same to the Committee on Ways and Means; and the amendment thereto by Mr. CASEY, with the following instructions:

"And that said committee be instructed to report a bill, making an appropriation of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars for each of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to be expended on the national road in said States, in the year 1840, under the direction of the War Department; said appropriation to be subject to all the restrictions and conditions of former appropriations on said road."

Mr. LINCOLN suggested that this being one of the days allotted for the reception of petitions, this particular petition could not come up. The rule provided that when petitions were laid over on account of debate arising on them, they must be taken up on some day that petitions were not in order.

The SPEAKER replied that the practice of the House had not been to apply this rule during the thirty days allowed for petitions in the beginning of the session; but only applied to such petitions as were laid over on account of debate, after the thirty days had expired.

Mr. RARIDEN said it was not his object to occupy the time of the House in any explanation in regard to the merits of these instructions, so often a matter of discussion. His object was to save the time of the House. In looking over the estimates before the Ways and Means Committee, he found that the Cumberland Road had been entirely omitted. It has not been recognised by the Secretary of the Treasury as one of the objects which should claim the attention of Congress. These instructions, he thought, placed this matter in a very unfavorable position, though he was in favor of any thing which would reach the subject. It was important to the people of the West to know the cause why it was omitted from the estimates. Whether it was a temporary abandonment, or was only because of the embarrassments of the Treasury at this time. It would be remembered by the House that no appropriation was made last year to carry on this road, and the consequence is, that the materials already purchased are being wasted and going to decay; and even parts of the road, which were partially completed, are in a condition to incur a total waste of the moneys expended, if something be not done to arrest the decay. It was important to know whether it was to progress; and it was for that reason that the friends of the measure took this course to bring the matter before the Committee of Ways and Means, inasmuch as there was no recommendatory expressions to Congress by the Executive, to show the importance of taking some action on the subject. He did not consider it proper, then, to go into the merits of the question, or discuss the subject, unless something more tangible should be presented.

Mr. PICKENS said, if he understood the resolutions now brought up, they proposed instructions to the Committee of Ways and Means with regard to the Cumberland road. The object of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CASEY,] in moving these instructions, was, in a manner, to obtain the expression of an opinion on the part of this House in favor of an appropriation for that road. Now he would submit to the House if it was fit and proper, at this early period of the session, to bring up a discussion on this subject. A vote in favor of these resolutions would be equivalent to a passage of the Cumberland road bill; and was the House prepared to march up to this question at this early period of the session? The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. RARIDEN,] was too skilful a parliamentarian not to know the effect of the passage of this resolution at this period of the session. He would submit to the House whether it would not be proper to wait for the coming up of this Cumberland road bill in the regular way, instead of bringing it up in this manner for discussion in advance; and he would also submit whether it was not fit and proper to let the Committee of Ways and Means pursue the regular routine of the high and responsible duties committed to them, without being embarrassed by instructions like these. That committee was the peculiar guardian of the public treasure: it was not constituted for this or that particular measure, but for the general interests of the whole country. If this resolution should be adopted, gentlemen would get up resolutions to bring forward another favorite measure, and thus the committee, as well as the House, would be embarrassed by the consideration of measures in advance. He protested against embarrassing the committee with these collateral questions. Let us wait until we know what are the resources of the country, before we commit ourselves to an appropriation for this or that particular measure. Was this Cumberland road of more importance than the civil and diplomatic appropriations, or the appropriations for the army and navy? Why, then, should this matter be discussed in advance? It was unwise, impolitic, and unjust, thus to override the important business of the country. He looked upon the resolution as inexpedient and unnecessary, and plunging the House into embarrassment and difficulty, and as nothing less than prematurely voting on the passage of the Cumberland road bill. Mr. P. concluded by moving to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. CASEY moved a call of the House. He wished to have a decisive expression of the opinions of the House on a question of this importance.

The motion having been agreed to,

The roll was called, when it appeared that 170 members answered to their names; and after calling the absentees, and excusing those who were absent in consequence of sickness,

Mr. BANKS moved that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. WICK rose for the purpose of asking Mr. PICKENS to withdraw his motion to lay the resolution on the table, to enable him to make an explanation personally interesting himself. He appealed to the gentleman, he said, to withdraw his motion even on the hard terms of his (Mr. W's) pledging himself to renew it on concluding what he wished to say.

Mr. PICKENS then withdrew his motion, saying that he only did so because the gentleman from Indiana wished to make a personal explanation, and on the condition that he would renew it.

Mr. BIDDLE rose to a point of order, whether the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] could withdraw his motion, on condition that the gentleman from Indiana would receive it. He wished to put the question distinctly to the House, whether it would tolerate such compacts.

The SPEAKER was of opinion that the gentleman from South Carolina could withdraw his motion, but the CHAIR could have nothing to do with the gentleman's motives for so doing.

Mr. BIDDLE. Can he withdraw it on a pledge?

The SPEAKER replied that he could not undertake to say whether there was a pledge or not. That was a matter with which the CHAIR had nothing to do. He could only consider the fact whether the motion was withdrawn or not.

Mr. BIDDLE appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. PICKENS then said that the gentleman from Indiana would see the difficulty occasioned by his request for him to withdraw his motion; and he hoped the gentleman would, therefore, excuse him for retracing his promise, and saying, as he now reluctantly did, that he could not withdraw his motion.

The CHAIR was about putting the question on Mr. BIDDLE's appeal, when that gentleman, having understood from Mr. WICK that the explanation he wished to make was a personal matter, withdrew the appeal.

Mr. WICK then said, that the reasons why he had asked for and obtained the withdrawal of the motion, with so much difficulty—indeed, with more difficulty than he had ever seen on other occasions—was that he might make an explanation, which gentlemen would soon understand, if they would give him their attention, was entirely personal to himself. As he did not place this subject on the same grounds which his colleague [Mr. RARIDEN] had placed it, and was not inclined to suffer the opinions of that gentleman to go abroad as his opinions, and the opinions of other Western gentlemen who acted with him, a brief explanation on his part would be necessary.

Mr. WHITE here rose to a point of order. He understood that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] had not withdrawn his motion to lay the resolutions on the table, and therefore the gentleman from Indiana was out of order to enter into a debate.

The SPEAKER said he understood the gentleman from South Carolina as having withdrawn his motion.

Mr. PICKENS. I did withdraw it; but seeing the difficulty it occasioned, I afterwards said that I could not withdraw it; at the same time expressing my regret at being compelled to deny the request of the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER understood the gentleman from South Carolina distinctly as having withdrawn his motion. Having done so, the gentleman could not renew it, and the gentleman from Indiana was entitled to the floor.

Mr. WICK rising and attempting to proceed with his remarks,

Mr. GRAVES called him to order, and renewed in writing the point made by his colleague, [Mr. WHITE] with the point raised by Mr. BIDDLE.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from South Carolida withdrew his motion to lay the resolution on the table, and could not again renew it, while the gentleman from Indiana had the floor. As to any compact made by the gentleman from Indiana with the gentleman from South Carolina, the CHAIR could not notice it. He had nothing to do with a gentleman's reasons for withdrawing a motion.

Mr. GRAVES appealed from the decision of the CHAIR, and addressed the House in favor of the appeal; but, in the course of his remarks, on hearing from Mr. WICK that he considered what he wished to say as having a personal bearing on himself, withdrew the appeal.

Mr. WICK said: I am glad, Mr. SPEAKER, that at length I am no longer impeded by questions of order—raised upon me, I trust, in no invidious feeling, though more than sufficiently embarrassing to one who never before filled a place upon the floor of any legislative body—and that I am permitted to avail myself of the courtesy of the honorable member from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS.] Sir, I have said that that which I wish to say is personal to myself. It is so, and perhaps equally so to some of my colleagues, or others. If it be personal to them, it is not a reason why it is not personal to me. It is important to me personally to define my position. My honorable colleague [Mr. RARIDEN] has intimated that the object of proposing those instructions is to ascertain if indeed the Executive branch of the Government has determined to abandon the Cumberland road, and that the same can only be done by taking a vote of this House, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the friends of the Administration will sustain appropriations upon the road or not. If I were to be silent, sir, it might be inferred that the view of the subject taken by my colleague is also mine. I am not willing it should be so understood. I therefore have sought permission to explain, lest it may be inferred that the design to connect this question with general politics, is common to all the members from Indiana.

Sir, my colleague has said that the Executive branch of this Government has not transmitted any estimate for the Cumberland road. I doubt not my colleague thinks so. But, sir, I find in the estimate coming here from the Topographical bureau, that a large sum for the Cumberland road is included. Will my colleague say that the Topographical bureau is no part of the Executive branch of this Government? Again: this estimate of the Topographical bureau is sent to this House, sanctioned by the Secretary at War, and accompanying a communication from the Department over which he presides, and to which the Topographical bureau is an appendange. Will my colleague say that the Secretry at War is no part of the Executive branch of this Government?

But, sir, if it were true that the Executive had given appropriations for the Cumberland road the go by, it is no reason why, on this occasion, and here, there should be an effort to make political capital out of the fact. The original and peculiar duty of the Executive, under the Constitution, in reference to expenditures, is to place before Congress estimates for the class of expenditures prescribed by the Constitution. The Cumberland road has not been brought before the nation by the Constitution. It is of legislative growth. While the Legislative branch of the Government (Congress) sustained it, the Executive also sustained it At the last session of the last Congress, the appropriation for this road was vetoed, not by the Executive, but by Congress. If it were even true, then, that the Executive has purposely passed over this road in the estimates presented to this House, it is scarcely fair to hold the Administration exclusively responsible. The Executive could find a reason for passing the road by, in the refusal of Congress to make appropriations for it. He might have inferred, from the action of Congress, that public opinion would no longer sustain appropriations upon the Cumberland road. But I infer very differently from my colleague upon this subject. I repeat that I see nothing from which to infer that the Executive intended to defeat appropriations upon the Cumberland road.

I have said, sir, that I regret to see any effort made to give a political cast to this question. I am always sorry to see any question embarrassed by political considerations. It is fatal to all fair and useful legislation to bring general politics to bear upon particular questions. Particular questions ought to depend upon their particular merits. This question has merits. In stating them I will be brief; and it is as necessary to my personal explanation to state the grounds upon which the subject, in my opinion, stands, as it is to disclaim sympathy with those who incline to give a political aspect to the action of the House upon the matter.

Sir, for years the nation held in its coffers, and used, without interest, immense sums of the two per cent. fund accruing to the Western States under a national compact. At length its expenditure was commenced, according to the compact, and, it is said, that it is all expended. Suppose this to be true, is it inequitable for the Western States to expect a small advance in return, out of a fund which will soon indemnify the Treasury?

Again, the people of the Western States have been taught, by more than thirty years' legislation, to expect appropriations for, and the final completion of, the Cumberland road. They have seen engineers passing along through Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and at least a part of Missouri. They have seen large sums expended year after year, and, finally, they have seen, during the past year, an estimate of the probable cost of the road, taken by engineers appointed by the Government, and acting under its authority. Think you, sir, they will now see the work abandoned, and not hold responsible those who contribute to the defeat of this their great measure.

Sir, a monarch, a despot, would not first instruct, by a course of action kept up for thirty years, a portion of subjects, to expect a particular object to meet his favor, and then all at once abandon it. And will the Representatives of a free people, who are conscious of their rights, refuse that justice, that kindness, to such a people, which a despot dare not refuse to his serfs? The Legislative and Executive branches of this Government, acting together, have produced the expectations which I have stated. Is it wise to disappoint them? Will not a jealous people, think you, mark those who defeat this measure? It is their all absorbing interest. Even general politics (I mean party politics) are absorbed by it. They will not deem that man, or that party, orthodox, who or which may contribute to disappoint hopes raised by your predecessors, the great and the good of past years, (they think they were wise, too,) who have covenanted, by implied contracts, stronger than mere party considerations—ay, strong as national faith—to continue appropriations, reasonably apportioned to the condition of the state of the Treasury, upon the Cumberland road, or make some equitable, friendly, and final disposition of the subject, far different from ceasing to appropriate, without reason given.

In accordance with my pledge to the honorable member from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] I renew the motion to lay the matter under consideration upon the table. But I do so in the fond hope that the motion may not prevail.

Mr. BIDDLE appealed to Mr. WICK to withdraw his motion.

Mr. WICK replied that he would do so if authorized by the gentleman from South Carolina. He was under a pledge to that gentleman to renew his motion; and, having done so, he was not authorized to withdraw it, unless with his sanction.

The question was then taken on laying the resolutions on the table, and decided in the negative—yeas 86, nays 111, as follows:

Mr. BIDDLE disclaimed any intention of discourtesy in his previous remarks, towards the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WICK,] when he interposed a point of order to arrest the explanation. He had done so because of his aversion to the practice which had obtained there, of one member making a motion which went to dispose of a subject without debate, and then withdrawing it, and yielding the floor to another, upon the condition that, after he had made the remarks intended, he would renew it. It was a practice which led to the greatest abuses at the last session. It was usurping the powers of the House for one member to obtain the floor, and to deal it out to whomsoever he pleased. He was opposed to all compacts of the kind between members; and the practice should be reprobated by all. That gentleman [Mr. WICK] had stated to the House that he wished to make an explanation personal to himself; but had converted it into a vindication of the policy of the Government in relation to the subject-matter before the House.

He thought a similar spirit of courtesy was due from that gentlemen to others, to whom the matter was equally personal to permit them to make an explanation. And what was the object of the honorable gentleman from Indiana in the personal explanation made. Why, to prove that the President, in the mode in which he has presented the subject, has acted fairly. He took issue with that gentleman. The President, he thought, had presented it in such a way as would best promote electioneering purposes. He had done it in such a way as would place the legislative branch of the Government in a wrong position before the country—as to throw the odium of extravagance on Congress—of going beyond the estimates. Mr. B. then referred to the message of the President, and particularly that part relating to the estimates for the year 1840, in support of his position. But he wished to speak from the book, because he believed the people turned with disgust from generalities—from wholesale denunciations, and therefore quoted the following paragraph, to show that it was intended for electioneering purposes:

Independent of the redemption of the public debt and trusts, the gross expenditures of seventeen and eighteen millions in 1834 and 1835 had, by these causes, swelled to twenty-nine millions in 1836; and the appropriations for 1837, made previously to the 4th of March, caused the expenditure to rise to the very large amount of thirty-three millions. We were enabled during the year 1838, notwithstanding the continuance of our Indian embarrassments, somewhat to reduce this amount; and that for the present year, 1839, will not, in all probability, exceed twenty-six millions, or six millions less than it was last year. With a determination so far as depends on me to continue this reduction, I have directed the estimates for 1840 to be subjected to severest scrutiny, and to be limited to the absolute requirements of the public service. They will be found less than the expenditures of 1839 by over five millions of dollars."

This, he said, was prepared with the consummate skill of a veteran politician—it was something compendious, which would do to carry to the mill or the market, for electioneering purposes. The partisans of the President had already seized upon this brief statement of professions of economy to glorify him and to advance his cause for another term. Would any man say that any credit was due to him for this profession of a desire for an economical administration of the Government? Does he not wish to convey the idea to the people that he had been doing every thing in his power to retrench the expenses of Government, and that he had been successful in breaking them down: and if he be elected for another term, that he would entirely do away with them. He believed that was the impression intended to be made. He called upon the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WICK] to show where a single abuse had been corrected by the President, or where a single retrenchment had been made in the expenses of Government. Not a clerk, whose services were unnecessary, had been dispensed with. He knew this message would go far in advance of the estimates, and do its work in deceiving the people. He then adverted to the waste of the public money in Florida by the mismanagement of the operations there—denounced the Executive because he had presented no estimates to carry on future operations there, where the military forces were as much needed now as heretofore—and attributed the change in that policy to a desire to prepare for the coming election, by presenting a seeming reduction of the expenditures. But he believed that all which would be saved from that source would in the end be wasted on something else which should claim less of the attention of the Government.

The President, he said, did not ask for a single soldier to carry on that war; nor was there any estimate for the light-houses, and other objects of expenditure, which had claimed the action of Congress heretofore. This he attributed to a design on the part of the Executive to render the popular branch of the Government odious in the eyes of the people—to throw the responsibility on them of voting more money than the estimates called for. He has called for but eighteen millions in the estimates, when, in fact, the appropriation by Congress will not be less than twenty-five millions. This will be the issue presented to the people—that Congress would be chargeable with all the extravagance—and that it would be used as an argument to prove that if the Executive had sole control of the purse, seven millions would have been saved of the people's money. He charged the President and heads of Departments with shrinking from the introduction of certain items into the estimates; and after these estimates had gone abroad, they would be found sneaking before the committee to prevail upon them to insert those items in the bills to be reported. He charged the President with lending his countenance to extravagance, and with skulking from the responsibility of recommending the measures which lead to it. He contended that if the regular estimates for the continuance of the Cumberland road were omitted on account of the embarrassed condition of the Treasury, that the Executive should have told the House and the country so.

Mr. REYNOLDS observed that this was a subject exceedingly interesting to his constituents; and for this reason, and not for any political considerations, he had risen to say a few words with regard to it. If he remained silent, when a question so deeply affecting their interests was discussed here, he should fail in the duty he owed to those whom he represented, and would be justly accountable to them for it. It was extremely unfortunate for him that every time he rose to address this House—and it was but seldom that he did so—politics should unnecessarily have been mixed up with the matter he felt bound to express his views on. This was the case, the SPEAKER would recollect, when the question of adopting the viva voce principle of voting was before the House; and he had again to regret that it should be unnecessarily dragged up now, when a subject so interesting to the Western country was under discussion. Now he was not opposed to political discussions in their proper place; he was not opposed to stump speeches, made boldly and openly, in the Western fashion; but he did not approve of the Eastern fashion, of holding a caucus at midnight and bringing out a candidate who could not say a word for himself.

But on a subject of the importance to the West that this was, he appealed to Western gentlemen to discard politics and discuss it with reference to its merits alone. No political capital could be gained by either party from this question, and he would put it to his Western friends whether a measure they had so much at heart would not be injuriously affected by dragging it unnecessarily into the political arena. Indeed, it would be good policy on his part to avoid a political discussion, for he was well aware that his desultory remarks would appear slight in comparison with the spirited, stirring speech they had just heard from the gentlemen from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE.]

Mr. BIDDLE explained. He would assure the gentleman from Illinois that he would not have said a word on this subject if it had not been for the remarks made by the gentleman from Indiana, who obtained the floor for the purpose of making a personal explanation, and then went into a defence of the Administration.

Mr. REYNOLDS continued. He had not intended to say a word in complaint of the remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for whom he entertained the highest respect. What he intended to say was for the purpose of showing to his Western friends the importance of keeping this question free from the political conflicts of the day. He would say, however, in reference to the President, that he was not averse to asking him for information on this or any subject touching the public interests, and would, with pleasure, vote for a resolution to that effect. He would not oppose a resolution reaching the Departments in a proper way, for he was not for stifling investigation when the public interests required it. But, said Mr. R. let us turn our attention to the subject before us. Suppose the President has neglected to recommend the Cumberland road to the favorable consideration of Congress. Suppose an appropriation for that road is not to be found in the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury. Were these reasons why the friends of the measure should not press it upon Congress? I entreat, then, my Western friends to join me in my endeavors to get the action of this House in favor of this measure, and, laying politics aside, assist in obtaining an appropriation for it. This road was, strictly speaking, a national measure. It was commenced in 1806, and had been uniformly carried on, year by year, down to the present time. It had been a favorite measure with the Democracy of the country, and had been sanctioned by Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe. He was aware that some gentlemen on that floor were of opinion that internal improvements by the General Government were contrary to the provisions of the Constitution. This was no doubt correct, as a general rule. But were there not exceptions to every rule? And was not this Cumberland road one of these exceptions? The Federal Government ought not to make internal improvements in the old States, because they had the power of taxation over the soil within their limits, and had resources to make these improvements themselves. That, however, was not the case with the new States. The vast public domain within their limits was exempted from taxation, and that resource for internal improvements was cut off. Give to the new States the power of taxing the public lands, and we will ask you for no more appropriations for the Cumberland road. Did not this circumstance make an exception to the general rule?

There was another reason which made this road an exception to the rule. There was a just, legal, and equitable compact made with the new States, by which two per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands was to be applied to roads leading to them. It was said that this two per cent. fund had been already expended, but this, he believed, was not true. He was informed by his friend from Ohio, that he had data to prove that a large amount of this fund was yet unexpended. If this was true, and he had no doubt that it was so, he hoped that his friend from Ohio would be the next to catch the Speaker's eye, and be enabled to demonstrate the facts to the House. Mr. R. went on to advert to the deep interest taken by the people of the West in this measure, and to the impolicy and injustice of disappointing their reasonable expectations with regard to it. He noticed the liberal appropriations made for other objects, and particularly for the defence of Florida, for which he had voted, and hoped that gentleman would extend the like liberality towards a measure so interesting to his constituents. He would remind gentlemen, he said, of the large sums collected every year from the new States for the sale of the public lands, and would ask them if it did not seem unjust to draw all this money from that section of country without expending some of it there in return. This very fact, he thought, was sufficient to make this subject an exception to the general rule. After some further remarks from Mr. R.

Mr. MASON said the gentleman who preceded him had spoken of the propriety and impropriety of subjecting this measure to the hazard of the whirlpool of party politics. He, for one, disclaimed all intention, all purpose, of subjecting this measure to such unhallowed test. The two great political parties of the country had not divided on this question, though gentlemen from each had taken different sides as to the expediency of progressing with the Cumberland road. Gentlemen of both parties had stood in opposition to this measure. He believed if the gentlemen from the West—the section of country so much interested in the measure—should fall out among themselves as to expediency, the enemies to this road would look on and say, let them fight it out; because they know that that would be the most effedtual way to defeat it. Therefore, the gentlemen from the West, of both parties, should act with some concert. For one, he disclaimed any intention or desire to make political capital out of the question, as had been attributed to some by the gentleman from Indiana. That gentleman had said it was not a party measure in the Western country.

Mr. WICK replied, that what he said was, that it was in the West an all absorbing question, more so than any question of general politics.

Mr. MASON was about resuming his remarks, when he was prevailed upon to yield the floor to

Mr. JAMESON, on whose motion

The House adjourned till Monday next.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, February 10, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the payments made on account of miscellaneous claims during the year 1839;

Also, a report from the Secretary of War, showing the names and salaries of the clerks employed in the several bureaus of that Department during the year 1839;

Also, a report from the Secretary of War, showing the contracts made by that Department during the year 1839;

Also, a report from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of Nathaniel West, commissioner to investigate claims against the Miami Indians, for the year 1839; which were severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 3d ult. relative to the estimated amount which will be received from the salt duty during the years 1840, 1841, 1842, and 1843, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROBINSON presented the petition of Joseph G. Bowman and others, for a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. GRUNDY presented the petition of William Purdy; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented the memorial of Alexander Jones, on the subject of removing the bars and deepening the channels in the Ohio and mouth of the Mississippi rivers, and applicable to the improvement of the Western waters generally; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALKER presented a document in relation to the survey of the coast and harbors of the State of Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALL presented a memorial of a number of citizens of the United States, praying the imposition of a moderate duty on imported silks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a petition from citizens of Philadelphia county, praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

The motion of reception was, on motion by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, laid upon the table.

Mr. TALLMADGE also presented a memorial of the representatives of the Society of Friends in the State of New York, praying for the abolition of the foreign and domestic slave trade.

On motion by Mr. KING, the motion for reception was laid on the table.

Mr. T. also presented a memorial from citizens of Philadelphia, praying for a duty on foreign silks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. T. also presented the memorial of citizens of Racine, in Wisconsin Territory, for the improvement of that harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SEVIER presented the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Iowa, praying Congress to extinguish the Indian title in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. YOUNG presented the petition of a number of citizens of the State of Illinois, praying for the establishment of a post road from Vandalia, Illinois, to Watertown; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Poast roads.

Mr. Y. also presented the petition of a number of citizens of Aurora, Illinois, praying for increase of mail facilities between Chicago and Dixon's Ferry in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. STURGEON presented the memorial of members of the bar of Williamsport, Lycoming county, Pennsylvania, praying for an increase of salary to the judge of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. S. also presented three memorials from citizens of Philadelphia, praying for the imposition of a moderate duty on imported silks; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. S. also presented a petition of certain citizens of Bleekley, Philadelphia county, praying against the admission of any State, which tolerates slavery, into the Union.

On motion by Mr. PRESTON, the motion of reception was laid on the table.

Mr. LINN presented the memorial of H. Hough and others, citizens of the State of Kentucky, praying the adoption of measures by this Government for the establishment and protection of a colony in the Oregon Territory; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Oregon Territory, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MOUTON presented the memorial of John B. Theale and others, praying the establishment of a port of entry at Perry's Bridge, on Vermilion bar, in the State of Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. MOUTON, the petition of James B. Sullivan, now on file, was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. KING presented the petition of a number of citizens of Macon county, Alabama, praying to be allowed to enter other lands in lieu of the 16th section, in township 17, in said county, for the use of schools, and improperly located to certain Indians; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. K. also presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Mobile, praying an appropriation for the erection of light-houses and beacons, for rendering more secure the navigation between Mobile and New Orleans; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. K. also presented the petition of John Scott, praying remuneration for the destruction of his property by a party of emigrating Creek Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the petition of a number of half-breeds of the Sioux tribe of Indians, praying Congress to carry certain treaty stipulations into effect; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. B. also presented six memorials of citizens of the United States, praying an imposition of a moderate duty on foreign silks; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the petition of Wilson P. Hunt, reported a bill for the relief of Gregoire P. Sarpy, or his legal representatives; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. L. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill to quiet the titles of certain land claimants in the States of Missouri and Arkansas, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which the subject had been referred by a resolution of the Senate, reported a bill making an appropriation, payable by instalments, of a sum sufficient to complete the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, and transferring the road to those States under certain restrictions.

The bill was accompanied by a long report, in which it is maintained that the Cumberland road was conceived and commenced in the wise and statesmanlike policy of the times, with an eye to the payment of the Revolutionary debt, by making the Western lands tributary to that object; that the Cumberland road is a great national work, to the final completion of which the national faith is pledged; that the contract between the General Government and the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, under what is termed the compacts, was for the construction of the road; and that the two per cent. was not granted to the States to make the road, but reserved by the General Government to make one, and that she is bound to construct it under the compacts at all events; that if the General Government could be viewed in the light of a trustee to the States, still she was bound for a judicious and economical application of the whole fund committed to her charge to the object intended, and she could not discharge herself by saying that the fund was reduced by grants, donations, the payment of military bounties, reductions of price, and pre emptions, authorized by herself; nor could she escape from her responsibility by saying that she had laid out her work on a scale too expensive for the fund reserved by her to complete; that a transfer to the States of the funds, annually, with the future charge of the road, would insure a continuous and energetic prosecution of the work, upon the most economical principles. Each position, and others, are examined at length.

The bill was read a first and second time; and the report, on motion of Mr. SMITH, with one thousand extra copies, was ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Mr. BENTON rose to move the Senate to reprint certain resolutions for the regulation of foreign commerce, on principles of reciprocity and mutual benefit, which he had brought into the Senate near ten years ago, but which had not then ripened into any legislative action. The resolutions were then brought forward, in view of the approaching extinction of the public debt, and the consequent ability of the Government to make a great reduction of duties on foreign imports; for which reductions he then believed, as he now believes, that both the Constitution of the United States, and the interest of the country, required equivalent advantages to be demanded from foreign countries, in return for the great advantages they would receive from such a large abolition of duties on their exports brought to our country. If the resolutions had then ripened into legislative measures, the country would not now have to regret the annual importation of fifty millions of free goods from countries, several of which oppress with enormous duties, and fetter with injurious restrictions, the products of the United States which go to their ports.

Having failed in his attempt to procure this regulation of foreign commerce at the epoch of the extinction of the public debt, he had since looked forward to the next event in the history of the country, which would enable him to renew the attempt. This would be found in the approaching expiration of what is called the compromise act, and which would expire on the 30th of June, 1842. That act conducted the duties to a point at which they could not remain—to a point which would produce a reaction—and would involve a general readjustment of the duties on imports. It was to prepare for this event, and to be in a condition to anticipate action by previous deliberation, founded on information, that he had moved at the last session for the call on the Secretary of State for a report on the burdens and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign ports; which call the Secretary (Mr. Forsyth,) had ably and elaborately answered, and of which answer the Senate had directed a large edition to be printed. This call for the report was his first step towards the revival of the plan contained in his commercial resolutions of 1831: the second step was, to reprint those resolutions, as containing his exposition of the meaning of the Constitution, and his opinion of the duty of Congress under it, and the advantage which would redound to the country from the discharge of that duty. When the report of the Secretary should be printed, he should move practically upon the subject; and should endeavor to ripen his plan into a legislative act.

Mr. B. said it would not be expected of him at this time, and on this motion to reprint former resolutions, that he should go into any general exposition or support of the plan of commercial reciprocity which he proposed; but it would be proper in him to say that what he proposed was nothing more nor less than the revival of the plan contained in Mr. Jefferson's report, and Mr. Madison's resolutions, on the regulation of foreign commerce, as far back as the year 1793, and which report and resolutions presented the true interpretation of the Constitution of the United States, and contemplated the acquisition of advantages to their country proportionate to the advantages which other nations received from us in the free or in the cheap admission of their products into our ports.

The Constitution grants two distinct powers to Congress in relation to foreign commerce; the first power is, to raise revenue from imports for the necessities of the General Government; the other, to regulate commerce with foreign nations. These are distinct powers, granted for different objects and not convertible or transmutable into each other. One of them—the first one—has been exercised from the day it was granted, and has been greatly abused, and perverted to objects for which it was not granted; the other has never been exercised at all; and has remained so long dormant that its purpose seems to have been forgotten, though the clause is often invoked to cover all sorts of absurd and unconstitutional propositions. Mr. Jefferson, by his report, and Mr. Madison, by his resolutions, attempted to execute this power—to give it a practical application to foreign commerce, according to the meaning of the Constitution; and their plan was to establish a discriminating duty of ten per cent. against the products and manufactures of the countries which refused to enter into treaties of reciprocity with us; that is, who refused to take some of our staples on favorable terms, in consideration of the favor we extended to theirs. The cheapness of our Government, and the largeness and value of our exports, it was seen, from the beginning, must put it into our power to demand, and to command, equivalents from other nations for the free or cheap admission of their products into our country; and this is what Mr. Madison's resolutions proposed to do. He was defeated, and barely defeated, by the Federalists and the British merchants, headed by Gen. Hamilton; and immediately after the rejection of his resolutions, the wars of the French Revolution came on, followed by the decrees of the Emperor Napoleon, and orders in council of the British; which, in a measure, broke up foreign commerce; and, at all events, put it out of our power to regulate even our own by law. These wars, and these ruinous attacks upon commerce, have long since ceased; and since ten years, he (Mr. B) had meditated the revival of the great work commenced by Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison, in 1793, and defeated by the Federal votes and British influence of that day.

Without going further into the subject at present, Mr. B. said, that the consequence of defeating Mr. Madison's resolutions were—first, that an important and express power in the Constitution had remained unexecuted for fifty years; secondly, that the regulating of foreign commerce (so far as it had been attempted) was done by the President and Senate alone, in virtue of the treaty-making power; and to the exclusion of the House of Representatives, which, as a part of Congress, had a right, and was bound by the Constitution, to act with the other component parts of the legislative power, in regulating commerce with foreign nations; thirdly, that fifty millions of foreign products were now received free of duty from nations which oppressed our exports with enormous, and, in some instances, prohibitory duties; fourthly, for want of acting on this plain command of the Constitution, and applying the clause to its proper object, it was made the source of latitudinarian and absurd constructions, and wild claims of power for a multitude of objects never thought of in the Constitution; and, fifthly, it was made a part of the pretexts and justification for the late enormous tariff, that we might punish other nations by retaliating upon their productions the high duties which they imposed upon ours.

Mr. B. said he hoped he should be more successful now than he was ten years ago, in his attempt to engage the attention of the Senate and of the country to the earnest consideration of this great subject. The time was approaching when they would be forced to readjust the whole tariff of duties; and it was the part of common prudence to foresee events, and to provide for them beforehand, instead of waiting until the crisis arrived, and when action, without deliberation and without choice of alternatives, became the law of necessity. The compromise act, as it is called, was only an adjournment of the question of the tariff—an adjournment of the question from the time when the country was prepared for action on it, to a time when it will not be thinking of it. This act expires in 1842, and every prudent man must foresee the struggle which is then to come on, and for which one party is now preparing, by endeavoring to create a necessity for the renewed imposition of high duties. Every attempt to divert the land revenue from the Federal Treasury, is a step taken in preparing one party for the struggle of 1842. It is my wish to prepare for that struggle also; and to prepare for it by anticipating the event—by exercising a granted power, thus far lying dormant in the Constitution—and exercising it according to its true intent and meaning, and to the manifest benefit of the whole Union. The regulation of foreign commerce upon the principle of reciprocity—treating the products of others as they treat ours—measuring back to every nation the same degree of favor, or disfavor, which it measures out to us; this is the intent of our Constitution, the interest of our country, and the duty of our Government. In the language of Mr. Jefferson, "FREE COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION ARE NOT TO BE GIVEN IN EXCHANGE FOR VEXATIONS AND RESTRICTIONS; nor are we to play the unprofitable and barbarian game of injuring ourselves to injure others. A reciprocity of benefits, instead of a reciprocity of injuries, should be our policy; and this policy should be presented, and imposingly presented, to all the nations with which we trade. It may not be that every one may find itself in a situation to relieve our exports to the same degree that we relieve theirs; but every one can do something: every one can relax, in some degree, its severe restrictions, and lighten, to some extent, its heavy impositions, on some essential tarticle of our exports. Each one that pleases can do this much; and those that do not please, we can force. Our position, and our circumstances, enable us to control and influence the commercial system of the civilized world. The large amount of our exports, their importance to other nations, our freedom from debt, the cheapness of our Government, the value of our custom, and our geographical position, enable us to command the commercial system of the world. We can command it: and we shall be blind to events, and unfaithful to our Constitution, to our interest, and to our duty, if we do not so far control and influence this system as to secure equivalent advantages for our exports, in return for the advantages which they receive from us in the admission of their products free of duty, or on the payment of a low and moderate duty. A discrimination of ten per centum to the prejudice of nations which refused to reciprocate advantages with us, would throw her commerce into the back ground, and make it secondary and inferior to the commerce of those in the same article which paid ten per centum less. Thus, and to exemplify the argument: a discriminating duty of ten per centum on either silks, wines, cottons, linens, woollens, or worsteds, &c. &c. against any nation which refused to enter into reciprocal arrangements for the more favorable admission of our tobacco, would immediately compel France and England to soften their rigorous systems in relation to that article, in order to avoid an enormous loss in losing a principal market for some one, or more, of their great staples. This would be its effect on the tobacco trade; and so it would be in relation to flour, rice, beef, pork, and every staple article of our exports.

Mr. B. said, that having given this glimpse of the plan which he proposed to revive, and having explained the reasons for the motion he intended to make, he would say no more at present; and would conclude with moving to reprint the resolutions to which he referred.

The resolutions were then read as follows:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 26, 1831.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolutions, which were read, and ordered to be printed, and laid on the table:

Resolved, That the powers conferred on Congress by the States to lay and collect duties, and to regulate commerce, are distinct and inconvertible powers, aiming at different objects, and requiring different forms of legislative action, the levying power being confined to imports, and intended to raise revenue, the regulating power being directed to exports, and solely intended to procure favorable terms in foreign ports for the admission of the ships and products of the States.

2. That the power to lay and collect duties on imports was solicited by the founders of the present Federal Government, and granted by the States for the express purpose of raising revenue, and paying the public debt, and with the solemn and reiterated assurance that the duties levied for paying the debt should cease the moment the debt was paid; which assurance was given in answer to objections from the States, and to quiet the apprehension expressed by some of them, that the grant of power to Congress to raise revenue from the commerce of the States, without limitation of time or quantity, and without accountability to them for its expenditure, might render Congress independent of the States, and endanger their liberties and prosperity.

3. That the public debt will (probably) be paid off in the year 1834, and the amount of about twelve millions of dollars of revenue will then be subject to abolition, and ought to be abolished, according to the agreement of the parties at the establishment of the present Federal Government, and in conformity to the present actual condition and interest of the States.

4. That an abolition of twelve millions of duties will be a relief to the people from about sixteen millions of taxes, (estimating the retail merchant's advance upon the duties at one-third;) and that the said abolition may be made without diminishing the incidental protection due to any essential branch or pursuit of domestic industry, and with manifest advantage to most of them.

5. That, for the purpose of enabling Congress to determine with entire safety to every interest, and with full satisfaction to the public mind, what branches and pursuits of domestic industry may be entitled to protection, and ought to be guarded from the injurious effects of foreign competition, a joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives ought to be appointed, to take the examinations of practical men (producers, consumers, and importers,) in all doubtful cases, and to report their evidence to the two House of Congress.

6. That the said committee ought to be appointed at the commencement of the next stated session.

7. That the power to regulate foreign commerce was granted to Congress by the States for the express and sole purpose of enabling Congress to obtain and secure favorable markets abroad for the exports of the States, and favorable terms for the admission of their ships, and to effect these objects by establishing an equitable system of commercial reciprocity, discrimination, and retaliation, which should measure back to every foreign nation the same degree of favor or disfavor which itself measured out to the commerce and navigation of the United States.

8. That the power to regulate foreign commerce, although one of the first of the enumerated powers in the Constitution, and the inducing cause to its adoption, has never yet been exercised by Congress.

9. That the approaching extinction of the public debt, and consequent obligation to abolish, and advantage in abolishing, about twelve millions of annual revenue, will enable the United States to receive a large portion of her foreign commerce, say the one half thereof, free of duty; and that the fair principles of a just reciprocity, the dictates of obvious policy, justice to the States, and the constitutional duty of the Federal Government, already too long deferred, will require this Government to demand equivalents from all nations which may wish to be admitted to a participation in the enjoyment of this great amount of free and unrestricted trade.

10. That the free importation of the following articles (among others) may be admitted into the United States without compromising the prosperity of any branch or pursuit of domestic industry, and with manifest advantage to most of them; namely, linens, silks, wines, coffee, cocoa, worsted stuff goods, several descriptions of woollens, several qualities of fine cottons, several kinds of spirits, &c &c.

11. That the free importation of the said articles ought to be offered to all nations which shall grant equivalent advantages to the commerce and navigation of the United States, and will receive the products of their industry; namely, fish, furs, lumber, naval stores, beef, bacon, pork, grain, flour, rice, cotton, tobacco, live stock, manufactures of cotton, leather, wood, and silk, butter and cheese, soap and candles, hats, glass, and gunpowder, lead, shot, and sugar, spirits made of grain and molasses, &c. &c. or some adequate proportion thereof, either free of duty, or upon payment of moderate and reasonable duties, to be agreed upon in treatie, and to continue for a term of years, and to no other nations whatever.

12. That there is nothing in existing treaty stipulations with foreign powers to prevent the regulation of our commerce upon the foregoing principles.

13. That all commercial nations will find it to their advantage to regulate their commerce with the United States, on these principles, as, in doing so, they will substitute a fair and liberal trade for a trade of vexations, oppressions, restrictions, and smuggling; will obtain provisions for subsistence, and materials for manufactures, on cheaper terms and more abundantly; will promote their own exports; will increase their revenue, by increasing consumption and diminishing smuggling; and, in refusing to do so, will draw great injury upon themselves in the loss which will ensue of several great branches of their trade with the United States.

14. That the agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation of the United States, would be greatly benefitted by regulating foreign trade on the foregoing principles: first, by getting rid of oppressive duties upon the staple productions of the United States in foreign markets; secondly, by lowering at home the price of many articles of comfort or necessity, imported from abroad.

15. That the safest and most satisfactory mode of regulating foreign commerce on these principles would be by combining the action of the legislative and treaty making powers, Congress fixing, by law or joint reiolution, the articles on which duties may be abolished, and the Executive negotiating with foreign nations for the grant of equivalents.

16. That to be in readiness to carry this system of regulating foreign commerce into effect at the extinction of the public debt, it will be necessary for Congress to designate the articles for abolition of duty at the next stated session.

On motion of Mr. LINN, a memoir, communicated to the Select Committee on the Oregon territory, in relation to the claims of the United States to the Northwestern Territory, was ordered to be printed with the accompanying map, and that 2,500 additional copies be printed.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following motion for consideration; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Commerce on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing a complete survey to be made of the coast of the State of Mississippi, and of the islands in the vicinage of said coast, and of all its bays and harbors.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing light-houses to be established at Mississippi city and at Ship Island.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expedieney of removing the obstructions in the Bayou Manchac, and reopening the same for navigation.

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of requiring forts to be erected on the western extremity of Ship Island, and on the bar or middle ground, between Cat and Ship Island, in the State of Mississippi.

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a navy yard at the west end of Ship Island, in the State of Mississippi.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were taken up on their third reading, read a third time, and passed:

The bill to authorize John E. Metcalf, and others, to locate certain pre emption claims to land in Indiana.

The bill for the relief of Susannah Honeyman, and her legal representatives.

The bill to amend the "Act to provide for taking the sixth census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States," approved March 3, 1839.

ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS.

The report of the Select Committee, to which was referred the resolution of Mr. BENTON, and the resolution of Mr. LUMPKIN, on the subject of the assumption of the State debts by the General Government, being the special order of the day, was taken up.

Mr. GRUNDY said he did not rise to discuss this question, but merely to ask that, when the question on the resolutions came up, it might be taken on each separately, and by yeas and nays.

The first resolutions were then read, as follows:

1. Resolved, That the assumption, directly or indirectly, by the General Government, of the debts which have been, or may be, contracted by the States for local objects or State purposes, would be unjust, both to the States and to the people.

2. Resolved, That such assumption would be highly inexpedient, and dangerous to the Union of the States.

3. Resolved, That such assumption would be wholly unauthorized by, and in violation of, the Constitution of the United States, and utterly repugnant to all the objects and purposes for which the Federal Union was formed.

4. Resolved, That to set apart the public lands, or the revenues arising therefrom, for the before mentioned purposes, would be equally unjust, inexpedient, and unconstitutional.

Mr. PRENTISS moved to strike out the words "directly or indirectly" from the first resolution.

After some remarks by Mr. GRUNDY and PRENTISS, the latter withdrew his amendment at the suggestion of

Mr. CRITTENDEN, who moved to strike out all after the word resolved in the first resolution, and, as a substitute for the whole series, insert the following:

Resolved, That the debts of the several States, so far as they are known to the Senate, have been contracted in the exercise of the undoubted right and constitutional power of said States respectively, and that there is no ground to warrant any doubt of the ability or disposition of those States to fulfil their contracts.

Resolved, That it would be just and proper to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States, in fair and rateable proportions, and that the condition of such of the States as have contracted debts is such at the present moment of pressure and difficulty as to render such distribution especially expedient and important.

Mr. CRITTENDEN submitted his reasons for proposing the substitute, when

Mr. ALLEN intimating an intention of addressing the Senate on the subject, on his motion it was informally passed over, and the substitute ordered to be printed.

The Senate then went into Executive business, And afterwards adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, Feb. 10, 1840.

The SPEAKER announced the first business in order to be the reception of resolutions; and, thereupon, the States were called in their order. [See below.]

Mr. HAND of New York gave notice of his intention to ask leave to bring in a bill to establish an uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal all acts heretofore passed on that subject.

Mr. OGLE offered a resolution providing for the appointment of a select committee on the subject of coinage, and directing the said committee to inquire into the expediency of discontinuing the operations at the several Branch Mints of the United States, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

And Mr. O. moved a suspension of the rule for the purpose of considering the resolution at this time, and asked the yeas and nays on that motion, which were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 61, nays 104.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. SMITH of Vermont gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a bill to repeal so much of the second section of an act entitled "An act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," approved July 14, 1832, as levies a duty on the importation of salt.

Mr. WISE offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish this House with all the information in his possession, or on file in his Department, respecting the importation and employment of bloodhounds and their keepers (if foreign keepers have been employed) by the War Department, or by the authorities of the Territory, in the Florida war with the Seminole Indians.

Mr. W. said he was already in possession of the information which this resolution called for; and he desired to take this opportunity to state, in answer to inquiries from several portions of the country, that the War Department had admitted the fact, officially to him, that this Government had authorized the employment of bloodhounds.

The resolution was ordered to lie over one day.

In pursuance of notice heretofore given, Mr. ANDREWS, of Kentucky, introduced a bill allowing the trustees of Centre College to dispose of lands heretofore granted to the trustees of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum of the State of Kentucky; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

In pursuance of notice heretofore given by him, Mr. GRAVES (the State of Kentucky having been called) introduced a bill to authorize the purchase of the stock held by individuals in the Louisville and Portland canal, and to make the navigation thereof free.

The bill having been read twice—

Mr. GRAVES moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be made the special order for the 3d of March.

After some conversation on a point of order, a division of the question was moved and ordered.

Mr. DUNCAN inquired if a motion to refer the bill to a committee for the purpose of investigating the subject was in order?

The SPEAKER said that a motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union would take precedence of a motion to refer to a standing committee.

And the question being taken, the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GRAVES then waived his motion for the special order; and, on his motion, the bill, together with a report made at the last session of Congress on the subject, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CROCKETT, in pursuance of notice given, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants," &c. Read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BELL, in pursuance of notice heretofore given, asked leave to introduce a bill to secure the freedom of elections, and to provide more effectually for the administration of Executive patronage.

Objection being made,

Mr. BELL moved that leave be granted.

Mr. TURNEY asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. PROFFIT called for the reading of the bill; which having been read,

Mr. BELL said he did not feel disposed to submit any remarks in support of his motion for leave. He would waive his right, because the bill was nearly a copy of one which had been twice or thrice introduced here without objection. It was seldom that any objection was made to the introduction of a bill. After its introduction, the House might take what course it thought proper—it might pass or reject it at its discretion. He did not desire, however, now to occupy any portion of a day set apart for the reception of resolutions with a discussion on the provisions of this bill; and he would not do so, provided any thing like a liberal disposition was shown by the House in allowing the bill to be introduced. He thought proper to state that this bill was not liable to some of the objections taken to that which had been introduced in another part of the Capitol.

Mr. B. then proceeded to point out the difference in the provisions of the two bills—when a question of order was raised as to the right of the gentleman to discuss the matter at this time.

The decision of the SPEAKER was that, under the practice of the House heretofore, (although it was against his own impression,) the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] was in order to proceed in his remarks—if the motion for leave was made.

Mr. D. H. LEWIS appealed from this decision.

The appeal was debated by Messrs. LEWIS, CRARY, and BELL.

When Mr. HUBBARD moved the previous question on the appeal.

Mr. BELL said he would not put the gentleman to that necessity; but protesting against the construction given to the rule by gentlemen on the other side, and by which a gentleman not in favor, might be forever prevented from introducing a bill, he would waive further debate.

And, thereupon, the appeal was withdrawn.

The question then recurred, and was taken on the motion for leave to introduce the bill, and was decided in the affirmative—yeas 91, nays 74.

So leave was granted.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said he felt it to be his duty to oppose the bill at every step. From what he knew of it, he thought it ought not to be received.

Mr. BELL called the gentleman to order. Let him make his motion.

Mr. JOHNSON said he was going to make it, and, thereupon, moved the question of consideration, and asked the yeas and nays.

Mr. BELL insisted that the bill must be read a first time.

Some conversation on the point of order ensued.

The bill was at length read a first time—

And Mr. JOHNSON moved the question of consideration.

Mr. BELL gave notice of his intention to debate, and the bill lies over.

On leave given, Mr. BELL introduced another bill, entitled A bill to repeal the first and second sections of an act entitled, An act to limit the term of certain offices therein named, and for other purposes, approved May 15, 1820.

The bill having been read twice,

Mr. BELL said he wished that the bill should take its place with the bills on the table, on second reading.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BELL objected.

The bill (as the Reporter understood) was referred accordingly.

Mr. CURTIS, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of certain debtors to the United States, and to repeal certain acts in relation to such debtors.

The bill having been read twice, it was, on motion of Mr. C. referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The call of the States and Territories having been gone through with,

On motion of Mr. STANLY, the House adjourned.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. LOWELL said the subject of the resolution he was about to offer, was one of great importance to the country, and particularly to his immediate constituents. Under the rule, the resolution would lie over one day; and he had no objection to its taking that course, as it was his wish to submit a few remarks when it came up for consideration. The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the House all the information in his possession, or in the possession of either of the Departments, relating to the seizure and condemnation by the British authorities, during the year now last past, of certain American vessels engaged in the fisheries.

Mr. CUSHING submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if, in his opinion, compatible with the public interest, to communicate to this House any information in possession of the Government, respecting the assemblage of Indians on the Northwestern frontier; and especially as to the interference of the officers or agents of any foreign power with the Indians of the United States, in the vicinity of the great Lakes.

Mr. C. expressing an intention to debate this resolution, it lies over for that purpose, under the rules of the House.

Mr. ADAMS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, copies of any demand made by the Minister or other diplomatic representative of Spain in this country, of the surrender to him of the Africans taken in, or belonging to, the vessel called L'Amistad, and of all correspondence between this Government and the said Minister or diplomatic representative relating thereto; also copies of all instructions from the Department of State to the district attorney of the United States in the judicial district of Connecticut, and all reports of the said district attorney to the said Department, relating to that subject.

Mr. ADAMS also submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House a statement of all the public moneys of the United States invested in the stocks of the several States, specifying the amount invested: with the stocks of each State; the authority by which such investment was made; the terms and rate of interest of each contract; the security received for payment of interest and principal of each debt; the rate per centum given in the purchase of the bond; and the market value of the said bonds at the times of the respective investments, and at the present time.

Mr. HOOK offered the following resolution, which being objected to, lies over, under the rule:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the act of 7th July, 1838, to the widows of such Revolutionary soldiers who have died since the passage of said act, or that may die hereafter.

On motion of Mr. HAND,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions inquire into the expediency of so amending the acts of July 4th, 1836, and of June 7th, 1838, as to provide for those widows whose husbands have died since their passage, and those who shall hereafter become widows.

Mr. HAND also offered the following resolution, which being objected to, lies over, by the rule:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the necessity and expediency of constructing a national military road from some point on Lake Champlain, to some point on Lake Ontario, on the river St. Lawrence.

On motion of Mr. MARVIN,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the power of Congress to provide by law for the punishment of crimes committed on board vessels and steamboats navigating the Northern and Northwestern waters, and into the expediency of providing by law for the punishment of crimes so committed.

Mr. GOGGIN presented the following resolution, and in doing so, observed that he offered the resolution at the request of some of those whom he had the honor to represent, as well as from a conviction of what he himself believed to be due to the country:

Resolved, That a committee of five members be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire into and report to this House what has been the entire expense of the Florida war up to the commencement of the present year, with the number of troops of every description which have been, or are now, employed in the said war in the pay of the United States; and the probable number of hostile Indian warriors now in the Territory of Florida. Also, what causes have tended to delay the termination of the said war; and what is likely to be the probable amount of money necessary to complete the same.

This resolution, under the rule, lies over for consideration.

On motion of Mr. JOSEPH L. WILLIAMS,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce inquire into the expediency of making Eastern Tennessee a collection district, and Knoxville the port of entry for the same.

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs inquire into the propriety of reporting a bill to carry into effect the 14th article of the the late treaty between the United States and the Cherokee Indians.

Mr. MILLER presented the following resolution, which was ruled to be out of order, not being petition day:

Resolved, That the petitions and papers of the following named persons, heretofore presented to Congress, and referred to appropriate committees, and now on the files of this House, be taken therefrom and referred to the several committees hereinafter named, viz: That the several petitions and accompanying papers of William Monroe, Joseph Wolfskill, Reuben E. Gentry, Francis Cooper, Joseph Boggs, David M'Gill, Abraham Groom, Elisha Todd, Lewis Laplant, Francis Denoves, John B. Grazel, Gabriel Marlow, Charles Cardinal, Elizabeth Vincennes, John O'Bonnan, James Turner, Benjamin Costin, John Berry, James Barnes, John Barnes, James Alcorn, Frederick Barnes, Jesse Watkins, Lewis Burshold, Thomas Wason, John and Robert Heath, Francis Woods, Joshua Truman, Joseph Austin, John B. Roy, William Heal, Joseph Roy, and Sarshal Cooper, all citizens of Missouri, praying compensation for depredations committed on their property, in the year 1814, by certain Sac and Fox Indians, who professed, at the time, to be amity with the United States, be referred to the Committee of Claims; and I further beg leave to move that the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the bill which accompanied the same, made December 28, 1837, favorable to and for the relief of the aforesaid petitioners, and herewith communicated and presented, be referred to the same committee. That the petition and papers of Francis Roy, Austin Foy, and John B. Denoyer, claiming compensation for depredations committed on their property, by certain Indians therein specified, be taken from the files of the House and referred to the Committee of Claims. That the petition and papers of Lewis Bissell of Missouri, claiming compensation for depredations committed on his property, by an officer in the employ of the United States, heretofore presented to Congress, be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee of Claims. That the petition and papers of the heirs of Appollus Cooper, heretofore presented to Congress, claiming seven years half pay for his services as a lieutenant while in the army, during the Revolutionary war, be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims; and that the copy of a report made by said committee on the 8th January, 1838, favorable to the claim of said heirs, accompanied by a bill for their relief, and herewith communicated and presented, be referred to the same committee. That the petition and papers of William Nicholas of Missouri, praying compensation for two horses lost by him, in the year 1815, while in the service of the United States, and heretofore presented to Congress, be taken from the files of the House and referred to the Committee of Claims; I also beg leave to refer, therewith, to the said committee, the affidavit of Gen. John Ruland, being additional testimony in support of the claim of the said Nicholas. That the petition and papers of John Turner of Missouri, praying compensation for depredations committed on his property by the Sac and Fox Indians, heretofore presented to Congress, be taken from the files of the House and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MILLER submitted the following resolution, which, under the rule, lies over:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting an adequate appropriation for continuing the improvement of the harbor at St. Louis, Missouri; and for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river above the mouth of the Ohio; and the Missouri, from its mouth as high up said river as the northwestern corner of the State of Missouri, or to a point where the northern boundary line of said State intersects or connects with said river.

Mr. RAMSEY offered the following resolution, which, under the rule, lies over:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the pension laws of the United States, so as to embrace the officers and soldiers who served in the armies of Generals Harman and St. Clair, subsequent to the Revolutionary war.

Mr. WICK of Indiana submitted the following resolution, which, causing debate, was, under the rule, laid over:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the compensation of the judge of the district of Indiana.

Mr. CARR of Indiana submitted the following resolutions, which lies one day, under the rule:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the price of the refuse public lands, as follows, to wit: That all the public lands which have been in the market for the term of five years, and remain unsold, be offered at private sale at the rate of one dollar per acre; that all the refuse public lands which have been in market for the term of ten years, and remain unsold, be offered at private sale at the rate of seventy-five cents per acre; and that all the refuse public lands which have been in market for fifteen years, and remain unsold, be offered at fifty cents per acre; provided that in thus reducing the price of the refuse lands, no one person shall be authorized to purchase more than 640 acres at such reduced prices or rates.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War report to this House the estimates and plan of Henry W. Shreeves, esq. to improve the navigation through the falls of the Ohio river. Also, report to this House the estimate and plan of the same individual, for the construction of a canal around the falls on the Indiana side of the Ohio river, if any such estimates and plans be in his possession.

On motion of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON of Tennessee,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing Delila Morris, the widow of Holloway Morris, deceased, a Revolutionary soldier, on the pension roll.

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying the fifth section of the act of 16th March, 1802, and other laws in relation to double rations to the officers of the army.

Mr. J. also submitted the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies over:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of the House: That all resolutions and orders requiring an expenditure of the public money, shall be referred to some one of the standing committees of the House, and reported upon by a committee before the same shall be acted on in the House.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia submitted the following resolutions; which, under the rule, lie over:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the laws in force, fixing the salaries for the Chaplains of this House and the Senate, with instructions to report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War lay before the House all the papers and correspondence in his Department relating to the slaves captured by the Creek warriors, in Florida, under an agreement or contract made between them and General Jesup—the delivery and disposition of the same, together with a statement showing the action of his Department in relation to their delivery and sale; also, the opinion of the said Secretary on the claim of Gen. John C. Watson, arising on the purchase of said slaves; also, his opinion on the propriety of an appropriation to pay for said slaves, instead of causing them to be elivered up to the proper owner under the said contract.

On motion of Mr. SHAW,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill, providing that the benefits of the act of July 7, 1838, shall not be withheld from any widow, in consequence of her having married after the decease of the husband for whose services she may claim to be allowed a pension or annuity under said act; provided she was a widow at the time it was passed.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to consider the expediency of causing a chandelier, of sufficient capacity to light the Hall of Representatives in the evening, to be provided for that purpose, in aid of, or as a substitute for, the present mode of lighting the same.

On motion of Mr. H. WILLIAMS,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of revising the laws relating to the papering of vessels employed in the whale fisheries; and also of making further provision for the protection and return of seamen engaged in that business.

On motion of Mr LINCOLN,

Resolved, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be directed to communicate to the House, as soon as may be, such information as may be within the control of his Department, touching the situation, quantity, quality, and probable value of the public lands of the United States, lying within the geograpical limits of the State of Tennessee; whether such lands, or any parts of them, have been surveyed, and into what division—what proportion is susceptible of occupancy and profitable improvement, and what parts may be utterly waste or refuse; and in general, that he include in his statement all such facts and information in respect to said lands as may lead to a correct judgment of their value to the United States, and the proper disposition to be made thereof.

On motion of Mr. LAWRENCE,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the rates of postage.

On motion of Mr. W. B. CALHOUN,

Resolved, That the resolution on the files of the last Congress, proposing a further provision for the surviving soldiers of the old fourth regiment of the United States infantry, with the accompanying papers, be referred to a Select Committee.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making appropriations by law for removing obstructions to navigation, and cleaning the channel in the Providence river, at or near the ports of Providence and Pawtucket; and for a survey, with a view to constructing a harbor on Block Island.

On motion of Mr. J. W. DAVIS of Indiana,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Greencastle, in Putnam county, by Russellville, to Rockville, in Parke county, Indiana; also to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Carlisle, Sullivan county, by Newberry, Scotland, and Hatfield, to Springville, in Lawrence county, Indiana.

Mr. J. W. DAVIS of Indiana also presented the following resolution, which, causing debate, lies over one day:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill repealing all laws imposing duties on salt, iron and lead.

Mr. J. W. DAVIS of Indiana submitted the following, which under the rule, lies over one day:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War furnish to this House, at the earliest practicable period, all such estimates, reports, and statements, in writting, as may be necessary to the proper drafting of a bill, providing for the continuation of the Cumberland road in Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois; and that he further submit an opinion as to the propriety and expediency of changing the manner of disbursing any appropriation that may be made for the State of Indiana.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD,

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing a pension to Madison Collins, Warren county, Indiana, and that the evidence presented in favor of said application be referred to the said committee.

Resolved, That the claim of Francis Malone, for compensation for services rendered in the Revolution, with the accompanying document in support thereof, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Resolved, That the claims of Richard Mack, for compensation for Revolutionary services, be referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee of Claims.

Resolved, That the letter of Jacob Olinger, a Revolutionary soldier, of Carroll county, Indiana, praying the passage of a law allowing pensions to all Revolutionary soldiers who served three months in the Revolutionary army, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing additional compensation to Capt. John Nelson of Indiana, and others, who were made prisoners during the late war with Great Britain, and that the letter of said Nelson, in favor of said claim, be referred to said committee.

Mr. RHETT submitted the following resolution, which causing debate was, under the rule, laid over:

Resolved, That the Committee of Foreign Affairs do inquire into the circumstances under which the American vessel Enterprise was driven by stress of weather, in the year of 1837, into the port of Hamilton, in the Island of Bermuda, and the slaves therein were liberated by the authorities of that island, and do report thereon to this House.

Mr. GRIFFIN submitted the following, which, under the rule, lies over:

Resolved, That the finished lobbies on each side of the hall be reserved for the use of the members, and those with whom they may be called from the hall for the transaction of business.

On motion of Mr. GREEN,

Crawford and Samuel Phillips, collectors of Newburyport, all that may be found justly due to them for their services and expenditures in superintending the light-houses, beacons, and buoys, in their districts, from the year 1831 to 1837, inclusive, and in purchasing a lot and superintending the erection of a custom house and public store in their districts; Provided, That the sum to be paid shall not exceed one thousand dollars to each.

Mr. MORGAN offered the following, which lies one day:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the House of Representatives whether in his annual report, made at the commencement of the present session of Congress, and in the estimates therein contained of expenditures proposed for the current year, he has included any sum or proposed any appropriation for the construction and continuation of the Cumberland road; and, if not, whether the omission was intentional or designed.

Mr. RUSSELL offered the following, which lies one day:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to inform this House—

1st. Whether Munson Smith, late postmaster at Schaghticoke Point, in the State of New York, was removed from said office upon charges exhibited against him to the Postmaster General; and if so, when—what were the charges—by whom were there preferred—and what evidence of the truth of such charged was exhibited to the Department.

2d. Whether Mr. Smith had notice from the Department of the existence of the charges, and the testimony exhibited against him, or any opportunity of exculpating himself by counteracting testimony, before the Department proceeded to act thereon.

3d. Whether the Postmaster General, on application therefor, refused to furnish copies of the charges, or give to Mr. Smith any reasons for his removal.

4th. Whether the Postmaster General, upon an application for that purpose, by a member of the House of Representatives of the United States, in behalf of Judge Smith, has not refused to permit said papers, charges, and evidence, to be inspected or examined, alleging that it was contrary to the rules of the Department to allow an examination of any papers, or charges, deposited in the office, and upon which the action of the Department had been invoked, or removals had taken place; and that the Postmaster General be directed to furnish this House with copies of all papers and charges in his office implicating Judge Smith, and which had for their object his removal from office; and also copies of the correspondence previous to his removal, between the Department and any person or persons relating to the removal of Mr. Smith.

Mr. CHITTENDEN offered the following resolution, which lies over:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested, without delay, to communicate to this House upon what terms and under what contracts the mails have been transported between the city of Washington and New York since the 31st day of December last, the name, and by whom the mails upon that route have been carried; whether by railroad or otherwise; whether, at some times, a portion of the mail only has been carried, and, if so, the reason therefor; whether there has, within that time, been any failure in the transportation of the mails, and, if so, the number and causes thereof; and whether, if so, what means have been taken by the Post Office Department to prevent any failures hereafter upon said route.

Mr. MONROE offered the following resolution, which lies over:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to report to this House whether he deems any action by Congress necessary to enable him to make such contracts for the transportation of the mail from this city to New York, and also to enforce the punctual performance of the same by such persons as may come under contract.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce inquire into the expediency of an appropriation for a survey of the Tennessee river and its navigable tributaries.

Mr. CARTER moved the following preamble and resolution, which were laid over:

Whereas purity in the administration of a free Government can only be maintained by the observance of strict economy in the public expenditures: and

Whereas extravagance and prodigality in the management and disbursements of the public revenue are the sure indications of an unjust and corrupt Government: and

Whereas a free Government cannot exist where public officers and agents are multiplied beyond the demands of the public service, merely to gratify the increasing desire for public employment; and when the public administration relies for its support more upon the interest and attachment of dependants and the amount of patronage under its control, than upon the impartial discernment of an enlightened community: and

Whereas public officers and employment have increased of late, in a degree unprecedented at any former period of the Government: and

Whereas the public expenditures have increased, within the last nine years, from thirteen millions of dollars—that being near the average of the annual expenditures in time of peace, up to the year 1829—to upwards of forty millions since that time; and

Whereas these facts clearly indicate a great degree of laxity and weakness in the public Administration, or a wilful abuse of the powers of Government, and a determination to rule by the use of patronage; therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire into and report to this House the causes which have led to the late extraordinary increase of public officers and agents, and the alarming increase of public expenditure, within the last nine years; and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

On motion of Mr. BOND,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing all laws authorizing the President of the United States to sign land patents by his secretary or agent, and by which the sum of fifteen hundred dollars is annually appropriated for the payment of that service.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the transportation of the mail in stages from Green Bay to Fort Winnebago.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of declaring Milwaukie and Astor, in Wisconsin, ports of entry.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a Surveyor General's office at Madison, the seat of Government of Wisconsin.

Mr. DOTY moved the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish to this House a statement of all investments made by the United States for the benefit of Indians or Indian nations, specifying the time when each investment was made; the amount set apart by the Indians in each instance for that purpose, and the amount actually invested; the description of stock purchased; the interest annually due thereon, and when and where payable, and when the stock is redeemable; the name of the person by whom the stock was purchased; and whether the amount due, and received by the United States, has been paid when the same accrued and was payable to each tribe, and in what manner the payment was made, stating the authority therefor, whether the same was made otherwise than in gold and silver.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Iowa, moved the following resolutions, which lie over:

1. Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands inquire into the expediency of granting land for a deaf and dumb asylum in the Territory of Iowa.

2. Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands inquire into the expediency of authorizing Joseph Williams and Charles A. Warfield to enter certain lands opposite the town of Bloomington, in Iowa, for the purpose of making a road through swamps.

3. Resolved, That the Secretary of War communicate to Congress such information as he is possessed of relative to the causes requiring troops to guard the payments of annuities to Indians on the Des Moines river, as recommended by him; whether such necessity, if it does exist, has not arisen from the fraudulent influence exercised by the traders over the agent; whether the project of furnishing troops did not originate at the agency.

4. Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of ascertaining the northern boundary of the half-breed tract of Sac and Fox Indians.

5. Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to this House whether the militia of Iowa have been called out under the authority of the United States to defend said Territory; and, if so, whether an appropriation is necessary to defray the expenses thereof.

6. Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be directed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Territory of Iowa to reclaim inundated lands in said Territory for school purposes.

7. Resolved, That the Secretary of War communicate to this House what is the probable annual amount of the extra freight on goods, &c. transported up and down the Mississippi river, and which extra freight is occasioned by the obstructions which the said river offers to boats navigating the same.

2. What was the highest price paid by the Government during the last summer and fall seasons, for a trip of a steamboat from St. Louis to Fort Snelling, and back.

3. What amount of money is usually paid in the recommencement of the work upon the rapids.

4. What will be the probable loss to the Government should the improvement of the rapids not be progressed in during the next season.

8. Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be directed to inquire into the expediency of separating the appropriation for the improvement of the rapids in the Mississippi river from the appropriation to improve St. Louis harbor.

9. Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be directed to inquire into the expediency of relinquishing to the Territory of Iowa the reserved sections at the seat of Government, in lieu of the land usually given new States for the erection of State buildings.

10. Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be directed to inquire into the expediency of so altering the mode of selling the public lands as to obviate the necessity of passing retrospective pre-emption laws.

Mr. KEMBLE offered the following resolution, which lies over:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so modifying the laws for the collection of the revenue, as to permit the entrance, for the benefit of drawback, of goods, wares, and merchandise intended to be transported through the territories of the United States into adjoining territories of foreign powers in amity with the United States, and that they report to this House.

On motion of Mr. DUNCAN,

Resolved, That the Committee of Accounts be required to report the amount proper to be paid for horse-hire per day for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOFFMAN offered the following, which lies over.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be required to communicate to this House copies of the reports on file in his office between Captain Kearney, Captain Sloat, and Captain Perry, of the United States Navy, and the Board of Naval Commissioners, in relation to the erection of a light-house on Flynn's Knoll and Robbin's Reef, and a beacon on Rome's Shoal, and in relation to Gedney's channel, all in the bay of New York; also, copy of a report from the collector of New York in relation to the same; and such other correspondence in reference to the said report as may be on file in his office.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio, offered the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a fund for the support of common schools within said District, by an application of a portion of the public domain for that purpose.

Mr. CURTIS offered the following, and, pending the same, the House adjourned:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of an appropriation to purchase a lot of land on the eastern side of the New York custom-house for the purpose of light and ventilation.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the privilege of drawback, and abolishing distinctions in ports of entry; also to inquire whether it be expedient to establish, by law, a system of warehousing upon merchandise.

On motion of Mr. J. GARLAND,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act of the 5th of July, 1832, entitled "An act to provide for liquidating and paying certain claims of the State of Virginia," as to embrace officers entitled to five years' full pay in lieu of half pay for life; and that said committee be further instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the payment of such judgments as have been or may hereafter be recovered against the State of Virginia for half pay or commutation pay under the act of the General Assembly of Virginia of May, 1779.

Mr. GRAHAM offered the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested (if not detrimental to the public interest) to communicate to the House any treaty or other solemn engagements which may have recently been executed or proposed to be negotiated by the authority of the Executive with the Seminole Indians in relation to that tribe remaining in Florida, together with the names of the Indians who signed such engagements; and if any lands were proposed to be surrendered to the Indians within the limits of that Territory, that the dividing boundary lines may be described and designated.

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill constituting the Committee of Elections hereafter in the following manner: That the names of all the members of the House of Representatives, whose seats are uncontested, shall be put into a box on separate pieces of paper, and drawn singly therefrom by a child under ten years old, until the names of nine members be drawn out of the box, no two of whom shall represent any one State. That the nine members so drawn shall constitute the committee, and be sworn to investigate all the facts and laws in relation to each contested election, and report the same truly and fairly to the House of Representatives.

Mr. STANLY offered the following resolution, which lies over:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill repealing so much of the distribution bill, passed in June, 1836, as gives to the Secretary of the Treasury the power of recalling the money deposited with the States, and releasing the States from all obligation to repay said money to the General Government.

On motion of Mr. TRIPLETT,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill providing for the punishment of public defaulters, unconnected with any other subject.

Also, Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be directed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a pension agency in the city of Louisville, in Kentucky.

On motion of Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting pensions to those officers and soldiers who were engaged in the wars in the West against the Indians, subsequent to the close of the Revolutionary war, and down to the treaty of Greenville.

On motion of Mr. DAWSON,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing by law a post road, over which shall be carried, in four-horse post coaches, the mail three times a week, or every other day, between Greenboro', in Georgia, and Gainesville, in South Carolina, by the way of Lexington, Elberton, Petersburg, on the Savannah river, and Anderson Court Hourse, in South Carolina.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Perry Court-house, Kentucky, to Harlan Court-house, Kentucky, passing by Breshear's Salt Works, in Perry county, and Captain John Lewis's house, upon the Poor fork of Cumberland river, in Harlan county, a horse mail weekly.

Also, a post route from Richmond, Kentucky, to Nicholasville, Kentucky, crossing the Kentucky river, at the mouth of Silver creek, a horse mail weekly.

Also, to inquire into the expediency of discontinuing the existing mail route from Perry Court-house, Kentucky, to Scott Court-house, Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky moved the following resolution; which lies over:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to urge upon the Government of her Britannic Majesty to have it settled by treaty stipulation between the Governments of the two countries that the local authorities of her Majesty's possessions in North America shall, upon the application of any citizen of the United States, being the owner of any fugitive slave which may be within any of said possessions, or the agent of such owner, upon proof of the ownership of such slave being made, deliver such slave to the owner; and in the event of her Majesty's Government refusing to settle by treaty the principle of delivering up the fugitive slave, then the President ought to insist upon a treaty stipulation between the two Governments, by which that of her Britannic Majesty shall be bound to pay to the owner of any fugitive slave, whose ownership may be established, the reasonable value of such slave in the State or Territory from which such slave may have eloped.

Mr. EVANS offered the following resolution, which lies over:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing and immediately constructing the arsenals, forts, fortifications, and works of military defence on the frontiers of Maine, recommended in the reports of Brig. Gen. Wool and Major J. D. Graham, communicated to the Senate by the Secretary of War, December 31, 1838.

Mr. EVANS offered the following, which lie over:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House copies of the arrangement entered into between the Governor of Maine and Sir John Harvey, Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, through the mediation of Major General Scott, in the month of March last, together with copies of the instructions given to General Scott, and all correspondence with him relating to the subject of controversy between the State of Maine and the Province of New Brunswick.

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House whether any, and if any, what measures have been taken, since the rejection of the recommendation of the King of Holland of a new line of boundary between the United States and New Brunswick, to obtain information in respect to the topography of the territory in dispute, by survey or exploration of the same on the part of the United States alone; also, whether any measures have been adopted whereby the accuracy of the survey lately made under the authority of the British Government, when communicated, may be tested or examined.

Mr. HOPKINS offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing the following post routes, viz:

From Hansonville, in Russell county, via Jonathan Wood's, to Quillinsville, in the county of Scott.

From Holston, or Chaney's Boat Yard, in the county of Washington, to Estillville, in the county of Scott.

From Christiansburg, in the county of Montgomery, to Hillsville, in the county of Grayson.

From Bickley's Mills, in the county of Russell, via Pound, to Turkey Cove, in the county of Lee.

From the Cove, in the county of Tazewell, to Bradford, in the county of Smyth.

Mr. OGLE offered the following resolution, which lies over:

Whereas it appears by a report of the Director of the Mint of the United States at Philadelphia, that the capacity of said Mint is sufficient for the annual coinage of $12,000,000, viz. half in gold and half in silver, with an average of two and a half pieces to every dollar in value, equal to 90,000,000 pieces, and that the force in officers, laborers, servants, machinery, fuel, &c. actually maintained at said Mint is competent to the yearly coinage of $6,000,000, allowing an abundant proportion of small coins:

And whereas it further appears that, in the coinage of $12,000,000 at said Mint, the average nett expense would not exceed 88 cents in every $100 made into coin, whilst the average nett expense in the coinage of but $2,000,000 rises to the sum of $2 40 for every $100 coined, the cost of coinage per centum being always in proportion to the actual amount coined:

And whereas the greatest amount in value coined in any one year (1835) at said mint was $7,764,900, and the average annual sum coined since the establishment of the same does not exceed $1,699,613 52. The coinage for the year 1838 at said Mint amounted in value to $3,979,217, composed of 15,336 518 pieces, at an average nett expense of $72,000, being a fraction over 1¼ per centum, viz.

Salaries of officers and clerks	$20,400
Wages of workmen	23,000
Wastage on gold and silver	13,000
Incidental expenses	26,500
	$82,900
Gain on copper coinage	10,000
Actual expenses	$72,900

The coinage for 1839 at said Mint amounted to $3,021,170 11, composed of 9,260,345 pieces, at an average nett expense of $65,700, or a fraction over two per centum.

And whereas the coinage of the three Branch Mints of the United States, for the year 1838, amounted to $227,323, composed of 443 793 pieces, at an average nett expense of $90,800, or within a fraction of forty per centum, viz:

Branch at New Orleans.

Salaries of officers	$12,900
Laborers	22,000
Wastage and contingent expenses	27,100
	$62,000

Branch at Charlotte.

Salaries of officers	$6,000
Wages of laborers	3,600
Wastage and contingent expenses	5,400
	$15,000

Branch at Dahlonega.

Salaries of officers	$6,000
Wages of laborers	3 800
Wastage and contingent expenses	4,000
	$13,800

The coinage of said three Branch Mints for the year 1839, amounted to $513,807 50, composed of 2,475,853 pieces, at an average nett expense of $80,600, or within a fraction of fifteen per centum, viz.

Compensation to officers and clerks,	$21,900
Pay of laborers	29,400
	$80 600

Therefore, be it resolved, That a select committee, to consist of ——— members, be raised on the subject of coinage, and that said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of discontinuing operations at the several Branch Mints of the United States, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. OGLE also offered the following resolutions, which lie over:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House copies of all correspondence on file in that Department, relative to the management and operations of the Branch Mint at New Orleans; and, also, to report to this House the alleged abuses at the said Branch Mint, which gave rise to the late investigation by the United States District Attorney at New Orleans; and that the said Secretary be directed to communicate copies of all the testimony taken in the progress of said investigation, and the report made thereon by said District Attorney, with the action of the Government in relation thereto.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire whether it would be constitutional and expedient to subject the banking institutions chartered by the respective States to the provisions of a general bankrupt law, agreeably to a suggestion of President Van Buren in his message to the 25th Congress, in the session of 1837; and, further, to inquire whether the commerce, trade, and business of the people of the United States can be conveniently transacted and carried on with a currency exclusively metallic; and, if not, whether it would be constitutional and beneficial to the public interests to provide one currency for the officers and contractors under the General Government, and another currency for the officers and people of the several States.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON offered the following, which were laid over, under the rule:

Resolved, That each of the United States being a party to the national compact, possesses an interest in the public domain in proportion to the Federal population of each, or in the terms of the compact, according to the usual respective proportion of the general charge and expenditure.

Resolved, That those States in whose favor Congress has not made appropriations of the public domain for the purposes of education, are entitled to such appropriations as will correspond in a just proportion with those heretofore made in behalf of other States.

Resolved, That the entire proceeds of sales of the public lands of the United States should constitute a fund to be distributed, upon some fair and equitable principle, to all the States of the Union, to be applied by the States severally to promote general education, to be applied to purposes of internal improvement, or to be expended as the wisdom of each State may think best calculated to promote its welfare.

Resolved, That the policy indicated in the foregoing resolutions would have the tendency of checking the wasteful and profligate expenditures by the Federal Government, and would, at the same time, leave abundant means in the Treasury to carry on liberally and efficiently all the necessary operations of Government, according to the genius and spirit of the Constitution, and the letter and intention of the various acts of cession.

Resolved, That ——— Committee report one or more bills in accordance with the provisions of the foregoing resolutions.

The following petitions, presented on the 6th February by Mr. P. J. WAGNER, were omitted in that day's proceedings:

The petition of Desire Jolly, widow of William Jolly, a soldier of the Revolution, praying for an increase of pension. Of Martha McMasters, widow of Hugh McMasters, a soldier of the Revolution, praying for arrears of pension. Of Effe Van Ness, widow of Garret Van Ness, an officer of the Revolution, praying for a pension. Of George Newton, of Fulton county, New York, a soldier in the late war with Great Britain, praying to be restored to the invalid pension roll. Of Mary and Elizabeth Odell, only surviving children of A. W. Odell, who was a captain and major in the late war, and died of wounds received in said war, praying for five years' full pay for the services of their father. Of Charles Nukerk, stating that he held a commission in the United States army in 1814, and that at the battle of Oswego, New York, in said year, the enemy took from him all his effects, consisting of money, clothing, &c. for which he prays relief. Of Noah Yale and others, citizens of Montgomery county, New York, praying for reduction of postage, and the abolition of the franking privilege. Of the heirs at law of Jellis Fonda, praying compensation for property belonging to said Fonda, which was destroyed in the Mohawk Valley, New York, by the common enemy, in the Revolutionary war. Of Esther Lefferts, late widow of William S. Thom, deceased, a lieutenant in the Revolutionary army, praying payment of the commutation of half pay, to which her said former husband was entitled. Of Joshua Webster and others, citizens of New York, praying that Simon D. Kittle, of Montgomery county, New York, be released from a judgment of $20,000, obtained against him by the United States, as surety for Alphonso Wetmore, late paymaster in the United States army. Also, the petitions, for relief, of Brigadier General Peter C. Fox, and of Mrs. Elizabeth Davidson; the former for services, &c. in the late war with Great Britain, and the latter for a pension for services of her deceased husband, G. Davidson, in the Revolutionary war.

Among the petitions presented by Mr. LOWELL of Maine, on the 13th of January, are the following, namely: Jacob Stevens, any other inhabitants of Crawford, Maine, for the establishment of a mail route from Machias, or East Machias, to Crawford: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Captain Henry B. Nones, and other officers of the United States revenue cutter Albert, that the laws giving pensions to the widows of deceased officers and seamen, in the naval service, may be extended to the widows of deceased officers and seamen in the revenue service: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Zebediah Rich, and ninety-eight others, for an appropriation to erect a light-house on Bass Harbor Head, in the State of Maine: referred to the Committee on Commerce. J. B. Knight, owner of the scooner Martha, of Eastport, Maine, for an allowance of fishing bounty on said vessel, for the time she was employed in the fishing service: referred to the Committee on Commerce. Polly Hamilton, widow of Richard Hamilton, deceased, that the pension of her late husband may be continued to her: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. Robert C. Stickney, Postmaster at Milltown, in Calais, Maine, praying an allowance for carrying the mail from the Calais Post Office, to the Milltown Office, from the first day of July, 1837, to the 30th of March, 1839: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The following is the Select Committee on the Tobacco Trade, appointed in pursuance of resolution:

Mr. JENIFER, of Maryland.
COLES, of Virginia.
SERGEANT, of Pennsylvania.
DAWSON, of Georgia.
CARROLL, of Maryland.
GRINNELL, of New York.
TRIPLETT, of Kentucky.
PARISH, of Ohio.
MILLER, of Missouri.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, February 11, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a report from the Secretary of War, showing the expenditures at the national armories, and the arms manufactured for the year 1839; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LUMPKIN presented the petition of a number of citizens of Paulding county, Georgia, praying the establishment of a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr TAPPAN presented the memorial of James M. Morgan, praying compensation for his services as bearer of despatches from the Governor of the Territory of Iowa to the Secretary of State; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, the memorial of Simeon Giron, on the files of the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, the documents in relation to the claims of Samuel Mackey, were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of John P. Dunklee; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. D. also presented the memorial of a number of merchants of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that steam packets may be allowed to transport a greater number of passengers to the ton than is now allowed by law; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BLOODHOUNDS IN FLORIDA.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from the representatives of the religious Society of Friends in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, and also fourteen memorials from citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, remonstrating against the employment of bloodhounds in the war against the Seminole Indians; and moved their reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BENTON said he wished to say a few words in relation to these memorials. He supposed they were like some other memorials, a large proportion of whose signers were women and children. He would say that the Government contemplated no such thing as that prayed against by these memorialists; and they were, therefore, misdirected when they sent them here. If some individuals of the Territory of Florida have imported such animals as those mentioned in the memorials, it has been done without the consent or knowledge of the Government. He was, therefore, opposed to a reference to a committee, requiring them to act on a subject which had no existence in point of fact.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had presented these memorials, expecting that they would be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, without a single remark, knowing that they could and would, in a report of a dozen lines, exonerate the Government from this heavy charge. He could himself have assured the memorialists that these bloodhounds had been imported without the knowledge of the War Department; but he preferred it to come in a more official shape—as the report of a committee. If his friend from Missouri would examine these memorials, he would ascertain that they were signed by many of the most respectable and best informed citizens of Philadelphia, without distinction of religious sect or political party. There were no women and children, as he had supposed, among the memorialists.

Mr. BENTON said he would admit the signers of these memorials were among the best of men, but he felt disposed to question their title to wisdom. They were not well informed; in fact they were worse off than if they possessed no information at all; for what they possessed was false. The Government, so far from doing what was insinuated in these memorials, had no knowledge whatever of it. So far from ordering these bloodhounds, they did not even know that it was done, until they heard of it, as the rest of us have done, through the newspapers. Having made these remarks, he was content that the Senate should take whatever course they thought the proper one. They might be sent to the Military Committee, or to the War Department, where they would probably be sent, if referred to that committee.

Mr. PRESTON said he had heard with surprise and satisfaction the declarations of the honorable Senators, on this subject, whose authority is undoubted, possessed as they are of such authentic sources of information. He, in common with many others, was impressed with the belief that these animals were imported, if not by the direction, at least with the sanction, of the Government, and he was glad to hear this explicit disavowal. He would wish, however, that declarations equally explicit were made as to the intentions of the Department in relation to these animals, now that they were in the country; whether the Government intended to employ them or not.

Mr. BENTON read the memorial of the Society of Friends, in which they prayed that Congress would put an end to the war in Florida, by extending to the Seminoles the hand of friendship. Mr. B. said he knew that there were no better people in the world than the Quakers. He was raised among them, and knew them well. But how wretchedly were they misinformed of the character of these Indians, when they supposed that by holding out the hand of friendship we could terminate this war! Mr. B. then referred to the treachery of the Indians during the last year, when an attempt was made to end the war amicably. They had invited Col. Harney to establish a trading house, which being done, they had surprised the post in the hour of darkness, and massacred every individual they could lay hands on.

Mr. LUMPKIN said the longer he lived, the more he was opposed to wars and fighting, and he would rejoice at the approach of the day when no resort would be necessary to such sanguinary measures. But, from the course which had been pursued in the Senate and elsewhere, he felt bound to say that his views were different from those of many others on the subject under discussion. As a member of Congress, or if he was connected with the Executive, he would not recommend a recourse to the measure which has been so much denounced; but if he was an inhabitant of that Territory, whose fields were devastated, and whose women and children were butchered by the ferocious and wily savage, he would think it no more a crime, if he had a trusty dog, to trace the lurking Indian to his lair, than he would to shoot him down when he found him. He confessed that he could see no objection to use these animals, which would not equally lie against the use of what are considered legitimate means of warfare. Holding these opinions, he felt bound in candor to express them. If the inhabitants of Florida have resorted to this means of terminating a protracted and destructive war, it was not the first time that bloodhounds had been employed on this continent in the contests with Indians. He would pledge himself, if necessary, to produce statute books of some of our States, in which a premium was offered for raising bloodhounds for the express purpose of hunting down Indians.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had purposely refrained from entering into a discussion of this subject, but would only say that the people of the country had a right to be informed concerning it, and the committee to which he proposed to refer these memorials, was the best source to which we could apply for that information.

The memorials were then referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Wisconsin, praying the construction of a harbor at Mulwaukie; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented four memorials of inhabitants of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, praying the imposition of a moderate duty on imported silks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the petition of a number of the citizens of the State of New York, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. YOUNG presented the petition of James Pierce, praying an allowance of bounty land; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred—

The petition of John Morton and John F. Larrable;

The memorial of Joseph Radcliff;

The petition of David Taylor;

The petition of Thomas Elliott; and made, severally, adverse reports upon the same; which were ordered to be printed.

The petition of Britton Evans;

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Joseph Roby; which was read, and ordered to a second reading

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred a bill to authorize the Legislature of the State of Louisiana to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools within that State, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the President's message on the subject, reported a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to refund the duties collected on the French ship Alexandre; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. PRESTON, from the Joint Committee on the Library, to which was referred the subject, reported a bill to regulate duties upon the importation productions of the fine arts; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred a bill to perfect titles to lands south of the Arkansas river, held under New Madrid locations and pre-emption rights, under the act of 1814, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Claims, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Seymour Treat; which was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to amend the act entitled "an act to amend an act entitled 'an act for laying off the towns of Fort Madison and Burlington, in the county of Des Moines, and the towns of Belleview, Du Buque, and Peru, in the county of Du Buque, Territory of Wisconsin, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1837;'" which was twice read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill to regulate the issuing and circulating of bank paper in the District of Columbia was read the second time, and, on motion of Mr. TAPPAN, it was ordered to lie on the table.

The resolutions submitted some days since by Mr. LINN, were taken up, considered, and agreed to.

ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS.

The report of the Select Committee, to which was referred the resolution of Mr. BENTON and the resolution of LUMPKIN, on the subject of the assumption of the State debts by the General Government, being the special order of the day, was taken up.

Mr. ALLEN addressed the Senate at great length and with much ability, on the principles of the report; when The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
TUESDAY, February 11, 1840.

After the reading of the journal,

Mr. ADAMS inquired of the CHAIR the reason why his decision was not recorded on the journal in relation to the resolution of Mr. RHETT, touching the slaves liberated by the authorities of the island of Cuba, taken from the American vessel Enterprise; and the resolution of Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky, proposing a negotiation with the British Government for the surrender of fugitive slaves in possession of her local authorities on this continent.

The CHAIR stated that it was not usual to insert in the journal the opinions of the SPEAKER as to whether certain resolutions came within the rules, unless an appeal was taken from his decision.

After some irregular conversation in relation to the point of fact at issue,

Mr. ADAMS argued at some length to show the propriety of recording all decisions of the SPEAKER growing out of the rule disposing of matters relating to the question of slavery. That rule was liable to different constructions, and he would be under the necessity of calling on the SPEAKER to decide upon all propositions which in his mind seemed to come within its vortex; and he was desirous that in every instance of construction under it, the decision should be placed on the journal. He would require that it should be placed there, not only for the purpose of showing to what extent the great right of petition was infringed by that rule, but because the Constitution, which directs a journal of proceedings to be kept by the House, demanded it. Important facts of the presentation of resolutions of a sovereign State, when rejected by the mere fiat of the SPEAKER, under the rule, should be entered on the journal. Mr. A. then cited an instance of the presentation of resolutions of the State of Missouri, by a representative from that State, and some proceedings had as to its reception; and not a vestige of such fact was to be seen on the journal, or even in the papers of the city. If he had known, on yesterday, that the decisions of the SPEAKER, on the inquiries made by him, would not have been entered on the journal, he would have taken an appeal, and the motion and decision would, of necessity, have been entered. Such would be his course hereafter. The amendment he now proposed was a matter of fact.

Mr. A. then presented his amendment, in substance as follows:

"Mr. ADAMS requested the decision of the SPEAKER whether the resolution [each resolution] did not come within the rule lately adopted in relation to Abolition petitions.

"The SPEAKER decided [in each case] that it did not.

"Mr A. then requested that the decision of the SPEAKER should be entered on the journal."

The SPEAKER requested the gentlemen in the aisles to take their seats while he made a short explanation. The CHAIR had not told the gentleman from Massachusetts that he would not make the entry in the journal that he desired. He told him that the resolution would be entered, if received; but that an entry of the opinions of the CHAIR with regard to its character would not, under the invariable practice of the House, appear on the journal, unless an appeal was taken.

Mr. ADAMS said he did not hear the SPEAKER make any such decision yesterday. On the contrary, he, by his silence, gave him to understand that the entry would be made. If he had not understood the SPEAKER so, he would have appealed.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON of Maryland rose to explain the reasons which would induce him to change his vote. The remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which pointed out the course he intended to pursue, compelled him reluctantly to say that he should vote against the correction of the journal. This circumstance, together with what the SPEAKER had informed them with regard to the uniform practice of the House, not to make such entries on the journal, unless in case of an appeal, would induce him to vote against the gentleman's motion.

Mr. ADAMS observed, that to say, and straight unsay, was one of the characteristics of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr JOHNSON.] I now, said Mr. A. in consequence of his change of the gentleman's vote, because I have been compelled to speak of his political capital resolution as it deserves, ask for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. TURNEY then moved to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays, which being ordered, the question was taken and resulted—yeas 115, nays 52!

So the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMS then inquired whether, under the resolution passed by the House some days ago, petitions would not be order until the 15th of this month.

The SPEAKER said they were in order, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MASON] had the floor on the question of referring the petition presented by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DAVIS] to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions.

The motion of Mr. CASEY to refer the memorial of the National Road Convention, held at Terre Haute, Indiana, to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill appropriating $150,000 to each of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to be expended on the Cumberland road, was taken up; when

Mr. MASON addressed the House at great length in favor of the resolutions of instruction to the Committee of Ways and Means. The continuation of the Cumberland road was a subject the most interesting to the people of the new States that could be brought before Congress. It was a measure which had received the favor of every Administration, from that of Mr. Jefferson down to the present time. Distinguished gentlemen of both political parties had often recorded their names in the yeas and nays in favor of it. Mr. M. alluded to the votes of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the former House of Representatives, and other distinguished supporters of the Administration. He alluded to these circumstances to show his sincere desire to disembarrass this subject of party considerations, and adverted to the criminations and recrimations which would result from mixing up party politics with this question. In his opinion, gentlemen of neither political party could lose any political standing by supporting this measure. He denied that this question had been suddenly and unnecessarily sprung on the House, as alleged by the gentleman from South Carolina; for the omission by the Secretary of the Treasury to insert an appropriation for this object in his estimates, was an ample justification of the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois. Added to this, were the strong memorials on this subject, which had already been presented to the House. It had been objected, also, by the gentleman from South Carolina, that these instructions were mandatory on the committee, without regard to the resources of the Treasury. Mr. M. went on to show that this was not the case, and hoped that no gentleman would vote against these instructions, under such a misapprehension. Mr. M. next proceeded at length to explain the grounds on which the friends of this measure asked for an appropriation from Congress, beginning with the compacts with the new States, the terms of which he undertook to explain, and referring to the recognition of the constitutionality and expediency of the road, by the solema acts of the Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania Legislatures. After an argument to show that it was the duty of the Federal Government to carry out the terms of the compact, he contended that the Cumberland road was no part of the internal improvement and tariff system which was such a bugbear to Southern politicians, and the death knell of which they congratulated themselves with having sounded. He invited Southern gentlemen to enter into an argument with him on this point, telling them that neither they nor their constituents understood the true merits of this question. Mr. M. referred to the opinions of General Jackson in his veto of the Maysville road bill, to show that there was no necessary connection between the Cumberland road and the tariff and internal improvement system; and in connection with this part of his argument, quoted also the opinions of Mr. CALHOUN. After deprecating the prejudices existing against this great measure, and the lamentable want of information on the subject, he earnestly appealed to members to examine deeply into it, assuring himself that on being possessed of the requisite information, they would not fail to give to it their hearty support.

Mr. PARRIS of Maine observed that, if he was to judge from the remarks of the gentleman who had just taken his seat, he would infer that all his batteries were directed towards the members from the South for interposing their objections to the constitutionality of appropriations for the Cumberland road. Now he, (Mr. P.) as a Representative from the North, would interpose his objections on constitutional grounds, as against the injustice and inexpediency of making further expenditures for this measure. The gentleman from Ohio had made a very able and eloquent speech to prove, what no one denied, that the new States were entitled, under the compact made with them at the time they were admitted into the Union, to 5 per cent. of the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their limits, to be applied to the making of roads leading to them. No one denied that these were the terms of the compact made with these States when they were admitted into the Union. But another question arose: Had the General Government performed its part of the compact? From the public documents now on file, he should now endeavor to show that this Government had long since performed all that was required of it by the compact. Mr. P. first read from a report made by a committee of the Senate in December, 1815, defining the terms of the compact and the obligations of the Government under it—after which, he referred to the act of the 3d of March, 1803, by which Congress appropriated 3 per cent. of the 5 per cent. fund for laying out and making roads leading to the State of Ohio. He would now (Mr. P. said) refer gentlemen to the document from the Secretary of the Treasury, laid before the House during the last Congress, which gives, as the result, the whole amount of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and the amount appropriated for making this road. The gentleman from Ohio expected an appropriation founded on the contract. Now this document would show that the contract had been more than complied with. The two per cent. fund was to make a road leading to the State of Ohio; and the three per cent. was to make roads through it. This he understood to be the compact with the State of Ohio at the time she was admitted into the Union. Now he would call the attention of the House to the amount of this fund, and the amount she had received out of it. The two per cent. fund amounted to less than one million of dollars, and the State had received from the Treasury of the United States six millions five hundred thousand dollars, being five and a half millions more than she was entitled to under the compact. This did not include the three per cent. fund which never had been expended on the road, but remained at the disposal of the States. This three per cent. fund would amount to one million five hundred thousand dollars; and this amount the State of Ohio had drawn from the public Treasury. Including the two per cent. under the compact, the three States who now asked an appropriation, would be entitled to two and a half millions of dollars only, when they had received over five and a half millions. These three States, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, owed the General Government, upon every principle of equity, five and a half millions of dollars. But it seemed that they were not satisfied with this large sum, but still asked for more; and, according to the statements laid on the tables of members, it would require about eight millions to complete this road, in addition to what had already been expended. If he understood the matter correctly, the public lands were not given to the Federal Government to be appropriated in this way. They were ceded by Virginia, and other States, not for the purpose of making roads, but for the purpose of liquidating the debts of the Revolution; and it could be shown by public documents, that the lands had not answered the purposes of their destination. The debts of the Revolution had been liquidated with the moneys received from the customs, and not out of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, as the States who ceded them intended. In the old States, said Mr. P. we have made our own roads without calling on the General Government to assist us; and if gentlemen will show me a constitutional power for repaying to the State of Maine what she has expended for making of roads, I will then be able to find a constitutional power for making the appropriations that are now asked for. The fact being admitted that the public lands had not answered the purposes of their destination—that they had not paid the expense of their acquisition, and the charges on them, while the debt of the Revolution was paid out of the customs—it would be worth while to inquire from whom these customs were collected. Mr. P. here quoted documentary evidence to show the proportion of the customs paid in his State, as well as in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. The result, he said, was, that Maine had paid three hundred dollars into the Treasury, where these three States had paid one. But it had been said that the amount abstracted from the State of Maine, in the shape of customs, had been made up to her in the building of light-houses, forts, navy yards, &c. This, however, was not the fact. These public works were constructed for the general good of the whole, and not for the peculiar benefit of the State of Maine. But, supposing this were the case, how would it contrast with great amounts expended for the exclusive benefits of the new States. The public documents showed that the three Western States he had mentioned had received four hundred dollars out of the public Treasury for every dollar they had paid into it. Since gentlemen could not but be satified that they had received more for this road than was due them under the compact, he would ask them under what clause of the Constitution they expected more. He would ask what clause of the Constitution gave Congress the power to make appropriations exclusively local and sectional in their operation. Was it to be found in that part of the Constitution which gave Congress the power to provide for the common defence and general welfare? Was it under the clause which gave Congress the power to establish post offices and post roads? Or was it under the power to regulate commerce? He was aware that the power to appropriate money for this road had been claimed under all these clauses of the Constitution, but he now understood that the advocates of this measure relied solely on the compact. The terms of the compact having been completely fulfilled, I contend, said Mr. C. that we have no constitutional power to make further appropriations for this object, unless the road is under the exclusive jurisdiction of the General Government. Now, he would ask what power they had to assume exclusive jurisdiction over this road? There was no part of the Constitution which gave Congress exclusive jurisdiction over the Cumberland road, or any other road. In 1825, an appropriation for this road was before Congress, and he was happy to find that there was one act of Mr. Monroe's administration that was worthy of commendation, and that was his veto of the bill. Mr. P. here read some extracts from Mr. Monroe's veto message. This was the language, he said, of Mr. Monroe in 1825, and he presumed that no gentleman friendly to the road now justified appropriations for it on the grounds of their constitutionality, but claimed them under the compact. It was sufficiently shown that these compacts had been fulfilled, and more than fulfilled, by the Federal Government, and that the three States now asking for further appropriations had received five millions and a half of dollars more than they were entitled to. At one time we are told, said Mr. P. that we are bound to make this road by the terms of the compact; and at another time, that it will bind the Union more firmly together. Was this Union, he would ask, only kept together by the money expended on different sections of it? Was that the only tie which bound the Western country to the Union? He could not believe it. He held that this Union was bound together by stronger ties than dollars and cents.

When this road was originally contemplated by Mr. Jefferson, whose authority the gentleman from Ohio quoted in support of his argument, it was never intended that it should be a magnificent structure, costing fifteen or twenty thousand dollars a mile, as it has cost. It was never contemplated that such a splendid system of internal improvements should grow out of it. If they had confined themselves to the true understanding of the compact, they would have had a very convenient road completed by this time, not costing more than the amount due them. To show, however, how far this had been exceeded, Mr. P. referred to the documents, which stated the amount necessary to complete this road at seven millions eight hundred and ninety-six thousand dollars and some odd cents.

Mr. P. also referred to the same documents to show the cost of this road per mile; by which it appeared that on one section of the road in the State of Indiana, the cost of one mile of it amounted to the enormous sum of $460,000, and the next mile was estimated to cost $211,000. Would it, then, be contended by any gentleman in that House that the Federal Government was bound under the compact to enter into such a costly and splendid system of internal improvement as this? He had, however, Mr. P. continued, said more on this subject than he intended when he rose, and he would therefore detain the House no longer.

Mr. HOFFMAN then intimated an intention of addressing the House on the subject; and, on his motion, The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, February 12, 1840.

Mr. YOUNG presented additional documents in the case of the Mormons, which, with those heretofore presented, were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TAPPAN presented an additional document in relation to the claim of James G. Morgan; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. T. also presented the petition of Eliza A. Melton; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented the petition of James E. Davis, which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WHITE presented the petition of J. B. Zander, which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. NORVELL presented a document in relation to the claim of Francis Laventure; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

FLORIDA TERRITORY.

Mr. WALKER presented a memorial from inhabitants of the Territory of Florida, praying for the admission of that Territory into the Union as a sovereign State.

Mr. W. said it would be recollected that, some time since, he had presented to the Senate a memorial from citizens of East Florida, praying for a division of the Territory. He at that time moved to lay it on the table, in the anticipation of presenting, in a short time, a petition for the admission of the Territory into the Union, with the view that both papers might be referred to a select committee, who would then have the whole subject before them. In accordance with the understanding at that time, he would now move that the memorial formerly presented, and the one just submitted, should be referred to a select committee of five members.

Mr. DAVIS said he saw no reason why this should not take the usual course of similar memorials, which had always been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALKER said that the precedents were as often one way as the other, and therefore could have no weight.

Mr. DAVIS said it was a matter of no consequence to him to what committee this subject was referred; but, until he heard some reasons for departing from that course, he must insist that the reference to a standing committee of this body was the proper course.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said that it must be apparent to the Senate that this question was not so exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary as pretended by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS.] The question whether the Territory should be now admitted into the Union, which was one branch of the inquiry, or not, was of little consequence compared to the question of the division of the Territory, which was deeply connected with their future prosperity and happiness. This question of division was one of the subjects proposed to be referred, and he thought it was evident this was not an appropriate subject for reference to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SEVIER said he had but little to say on this subject of reference; but he would tell Senators, openly and above board, when the question of admission came up, he would not vote for the admission of any free State, without admitting, at the same time, a slave State. When Iowa came in, East Florida must come in; and when Wisconsin came in, another slave State must come in, if they expected to get his vote for the admission. This was the course pursued in the case of Michigan and Arkansas, and this was the course that would be pursued in future. It was the only course which would preserve the balance of power, and protect the interest of the slave States on this floor, which was their last refuge. He had no concealments on this subject, and disdained to be beating about the bush.

Mr. DAVIS said he liked to see the candor of the gentleman from Arkansas—[Mr. SEVIER And I should like to see it met by a similar spirit.] He wanted this subject referred to a committee who would consider it impartially; and from the gi vings out, it was evident this would not be the case if referred to a select committee. He asked for the yeas and nays on the question of referring to the Committee on the Judiciary; which were ordered.

Mr. TAPPAN said he should coincide with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] in the propriety of referring this subject to a standing committee of the body, if we had a Committee on the Territories; but he could not see that the Committee on the Judiciary had any thing more to do with it than many other of the standing committees —certainly not as much as the Committee on the Public Lands. Nor did he see so much force in his argument that this subject would not be treated impartially by a select committee. There were two propositions to be referred, which were adverse to each other; now they could not be partial to both; so they were just as sure of the subject being considered impartially as if sent to a standing committee. He thought a reference to a select committee would be the proper course.

Mr. MERRICK coincided in the views expressed by the Senator from Arkansas, and in so doing, he should vote for the reference to a select committee.

The question was then taken on the reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, and decided in the negative—ayes 13, noes 22, as follows:

AYES—Messrs. Clayton, Davis, Knight, Phelps, Prentiss, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, Wall, Webster, White, and Williams—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Calhoun, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, Linn, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Sevier, Strange, Tappan, Walker, Wright, and Young—22.

The question was then taken on referring the memorials to a select committee, and decided in the affirmative.

The committee consists of

Mr. WALKER.
Mr. NORVELL.
Mr. DAVIS.
Mr. BROWN.
Mr. SEVIER.

Mr. WEBSTER presented three memorials from citizens of Philadelphia, praying for the imposition of a moderate duty on silks; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALL presented a memorial of similar character; which took the same reference.

Mr. KNIGHT presented the petition of Mary Tewgood; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

SALT TAX AND FISHING BOUNTIES AND ALLOWANCES.

Mr. BENTON rose to communicate to the Senate several bundles of papers which he held in his hands, in relation to the salt duties, and the fishing bounties and allowances founded upon those duties; and to move their reference to the Finance Committee, which had the subject under consideration, to which they related.

Mr. B. said it would be recollected by the Senators who had been long members of this body, that he had commenced his labors on the salt tax, and its appurtenant burden, the fishing bounties and allowances, about ten or twelve years ago; and that he had made but very little progress in his labor since that time, though often doing his best. Not to despair of a good cause, and not to give up for a few defeats, was one of his maxims—perhaps a part of his nature; for he never felt himself to be vanquished while he felt himself to be right. This was the case on this salt subject. Though defeated for ten years, he did not despair; on the contrary, he felt stronger in the faith than ever, and more fresh and vigorous for action now than he did when the contest first began. His relaxation from the contest on this floor, had been employed in preparations for renewing the contests upon this floor; and these preparations had resulted in the accumulation of a mass of information, part of which had been received from the Treasury Department, and part of which had been collected from other sources. That which had come from the Treasury, had already been referred to the Finance Committee by the order of the Senate; that which he had collected from other sources, he now asked leave to communicate to the Senate, and to have it referred to the same committee.

Mr. B. then sent to the table four several packages of papers, labelled as follows:

1. Thirty queries on the salt trade, and salt manufature in the West, addressed to his constituents by Mr. BENTON of Missouri, with their answers thereto, showing the monopoly, adulteration, deficient bushel, districted allowance, stinted quantity, and extortionate price, of salt in Missouri, and the necessity of the free admission of foreign salt.

2. A communication from the Democratic State Convention in Missouri; from the Hon. Mr. Miller of Missouri; from the Hon. Mr. Chapman of Iowa; from Judge King of Missouri, showing the monopoly, adulteration, extortionate price, and other abuses in the salt trade; and the connection of several banks with said monopoly and abuses.

3. A general statement of all the salt manufactories in the United States and their products, and cost of their salt at their works; with a particular account of the salt works in New England, in New York, at the Kenhawa, and on the Holston, in Virginia, and of the import of foreign salt at New Orleans.

4. Statistics of salt, showing its localities, diffusion, abundance, and universality; its various forms, both liquid and solid; its different qualities; its manufacture; its cheapness of first cost; its uses in the animal economy, in agriculture, in different branches of rural economy, and in the useful arts; its vast consumption; the tendency of monarchical governments to tax it oppressively, both in ancient and in modern times; the repugnance of the people to the tax in all ages; its final abolition in many countries; compiled from English, French, and American Encyclopedias, and other authentic sources.

These several packages, Mr. B. said, in addition to the two reports from Mr. Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to calls from the Senate; one in relation to the importation of salt from foreign countries, showing the quantities imported from each country, and the orginal cost; the other in relation to the fishing bounties and allowances, and the amount they draw from the Treasury, and the frauds which have grown out of them: these four packages, and these two reports, contained the mass of information which would enable him to recommence his labor at this session; and with better hopes of success than heretofore. All that he had to ask now was, that these packages should be referred to the Finance Committee; to which he should submit the question of their importance, and their title to be printed in extra numbers, for distribution among our constituents. When the papers were printed, and the time arrived for action upon them, he (Mr. B.) would undertake to establish, upon the evidence which they contained, two propositions: First, that of the $320,000 annually, to which the fishing bounties and allowances now amounted, pretty nearly $300,000 of that sum was illegally and unduly drawn from the Treasury; Secondly, that the salt tax, and its abuses, was an annual injury to the amount of several millions of dollars on the agriculture and rural economy of the West. These two propositions he expected to establish; and, if he did so, he should expect, as a consequence, that his bill should pass—the bill which he had renewed at the commencement of this session—for the suppression of the salt tax, and the abolition of the fishing bounties and allowances founded upon that tax.

Mr. B. then moved the reference of the papers to the Finance Committee; and they were accordingly referred.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the petition of a number of citizens of New Orleans, praying the repeal of the naturalization laws, reported that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to fix the minimum price of the public lands acquired by the Miami treaty of Nov. 6, 1838; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill for the benefit of the Howard Institution of the city of Washington; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. NORVELL, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill authorizing the States to tax any lands within their limits sold by the United States; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which had been referred the various documents in relation to the claim of Francis Laventure, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that they be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands; which was agreed to.

ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS.

The report of the Select Committee, to which was referred the resolution of Mr. BENTON and the resolution of Mr. LUMPKIN, on the subject of the assumption of the State debts by the General Government, being the special order of the day, was taken up.

Mr. PHELPS was entitled to the floor; but being indisposed, yielded it to

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, who addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the resolutions of the select committee.

The subject was then informally passed over, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, February 12, 1840.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the motion of Mr. CASEY to refer the memorial of the National Road Convention, held at Terre Haute, Indiana, to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill appropriating $150,000 to each of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to be expended on the Cumberland road.

Mr. HOFFMAN, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House at some length in opposition to the resolution. He was in favor of appropriations for this road; but was opposed to the manner in which the measure was now brought before the House. He also objected to any action on the subject until the House obtained some information with regard to the views of the Executive.

Mr. HUBBARD then followed in opposition to the motion for instructions, as well as opposing any appropriations for this road on constitutional grounds.

Mr. HOWARD of Indiana next addressed the House at great length, and with much force and ability, in favor of continuing the appropriations for this great work. His argument was to the constitutionality as well as the justice and expediency of the measure.

After the presentation by the SPEAKER of a number of Executive documents which had accumulated on his table, and their reference to appropriate committees,

Mr. PICKENS obtained the floor, and presented a substitute for the motion of Mr. CASEY, and so to modify said motion as to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the propriiye and expediency of making an appropriation for the continuation of the Cumberland road. Mr. P. without proceeding in his remarks, made a motion, which, he said, he had not before made—that the House adjourn; which was agreed to; and

The House adjourned till to-morrow morning.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 13, 1840.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented sixteen memorials from citizens of Pennsylvania, praying an increase of the duties on silks; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. B. also presented the petition of the widow of Samuel Jamison; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ROANE presented a petition of Thomas R. Saunders; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut presented the memorial of the heirs of the Baron De Kalb; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. STURGEON presented eight memorials from citizens of Pennsylvania, praying an increase of the duties on silks; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT presented two memorials of a number of citizens of New York, praying the passage of a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WHITE presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana for the relief of Peter Houston; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented three petitions of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of a general bankrupt law; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STURGEON presented a memorial of a number of women, inhabitants of Alleghany county, praying for the abolition of slavery; the motion to receive which was laid on the table.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented the petition of the Kentucky State Agricultural Society, praying the endowment of an agricultural school or college out of the funds of the Smithsonian legacy; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. CLAY presented the petition of Michael H. Barton, praying for the abolition of slavery. He said that he presented this paper in deference to the right of petition, which he admitted in its full force. He thought the crisis of this unfortunate agitation was passed; it was certainly passed when Congress convened in December last. Whether the political uses which have since been made of it may not revive it, and revive it in a more imposing form, he was not prepared to say.

Mr. C. took occasion to express the gratification which he had derived, during the last summer, from the perusal of some valuable works from Northern pens on the subject of Abolition, and he considered them the ablest defences of Southern institutions which he had seen. He designated "The Review of Dr. Channing Reviewed," by a distinguished citizen of Boston; "Abolition a Sedition;" and "Some Thoughts on Domestic Slavery;" which were sold at Mr. Franck Taylor's book store on the avenue, this side of Gadsby's. In the last named work, which contained many profound philosophical truths, the proposition was presented with uncommon force, that two communities of distinct races cannot live together without the one becoming more or less in subjection to the other. Mr. CLAY had called the writer's attention to the illustration given to his argument by Lord Durham, in his report on the condition of Canada, submitted to the British Government. He expressed the firmest conviction that whoever would read that report would come to the same conlusion which was arrived at by the author of "Thoughts on Domestic Slavery." Lord Durham states, as his decided opinion, after much observation of the French and British residents in Canada, that they cannot live together harmoniously, and that it is utterly impossible to hope for peace and tranquillity in these provinces, except by making one portion of the inhabitants subordinate to the other.

Mr. CALHOUN said he rose to express the pleasure he felt at the evidence which the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky furnished of the progress of truth on the subject of Abolition. He had spoken, with strong approbation, of the principle laid down in a recent pamphlet, that two races, of different character and origin, could not co-exist in the same country, without the subordination of the one to the other. He was gratified to hear the Senator give assent to so important a principle, in application to the condition of the South. He had himself, several years since, stated the same, in more specific terms; that it was impossible for two races, so dissimilar in every respect as the European and African, that inhabit the Southern portion of this Union, to exist together in nearly equal numbers, in any other relation than that which existed there. He also added, that experience had shown that they could so exist in peace and happiness there, certainly to the great benefit of the inferior race; and that to destroy it, was to doom the latter to destruction. But he uttered these important truths then in vain, as far as the side to which the Senator belongs is concerned.

He trusted the progress of truth would not, however, stop at the point to which it has arrived with the Senator, and that it will make some progress in regard to what is called the right of petition. Never was a right so much mystified and magnified. To listen to the discussion, here and elsewhere, you would suppose it to be the most essential and important right: so far from it, he undertook to aver that, under our free and popular system, it was among the least important of all our political rights. It had been superseded, in a great degree, by the far higher right of general suffrage, and by the practice, now so common, of instruction. There could be no local grievance but what could be reached by these, except it might be the grievance, affecting a minority, which could be no more redressed by petition, than by them. The truth is, that the right of petition could scarcely be said to be the right of a freeman. It belongs to despotic Governments more properly, and might be said to be the last right of of slaves. Who ever heard of petition in the free States of antiquity? We had borrowed our notions in regard to it from our British ancestors, with whom it had a value, from their imperfect representation, far greater than it has with us; and it is owing to that it has a place at all in our Constitution. The truth is, that the right has been so far superseded, in a political point of view, that it has ceased to be what the Constitution contemplated it to be—a shield to protect against wrongs—and has been perverted into a sword to attack the rights of others—to cause a grievance, instead of the means of redressing grievances, as in the case of Abolition petitions. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAPPAN] has viewed this subject in its proper light, and has taken a truly patriotic and constitutional stand in refusing to present these fire-brands, for which I heartily thank him, in the name of my State. Had the Senator from Kentucky followed the example, he would have rendered inestimable service to the country.

Mr. CLAY said it was very true that the Senator from South Carolina might be the original inventor of the idea respecting the two races, but, like some other inventors, he had not derived much profit from the discovery. However, he had not so much commended the idea as the manner in which it, has been illustrated and enforced, by the author of whom he had spoken. As to the right of petition, he did not consider it a matter of such small importance, or why was it guarded with such sedulous care by the framers of our Constitution? He was for respecting it; and he believed that if these Abolition petitions were received and reported on, and not so much harshness of language used in regard to them, there would have been much less excitement than had been on this subject. But his remarks were not in reference to the vote in the House, but to the politicians and political newspapers. With regard to the compliment paid to the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. TAPPAN,] it was well merited, and the merit was somewhat enhanced by the understanding that that gentleman had heretofore entertained opposite sentiments.

Mr. TALLMADGE said that his views of the right of petition had been submitted heretofore, but he could not permit the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina to pass without remark. The Senator had said that we had derived this right of petition from England anterior to our struggle with that country, and that it had been superseded, and rendered of trivial importance, by the right of suffrage. It had been always considered a matter of the highest importance, both before the Revolution and since that event—from the first struggle of liberty in this country down to the present time. In proof of this, he referred to the sentiments on the subject which pervaded all the public meetings immediately previous to and during the Revolution, and which were expressed in their resolutions and reports. With the same object, also, he referred to that amendment to the Constitution which guards the right, and prohibits Congress from doing any thing to abridge it. This was one of the amendments, the adoption of which was made by New York an express condition antecedent to her ratification of the Constitution; which event was principally to be ascribed to the talents and eloquence of Alexander Hamilton, who was described on this floor the other day as being a man of only second rate abilities, and an imitator. The right of petition went behind the Constitution. The citizen has a right to petition even for that which Congress is prohibited by the Constitution from granting. They may petition for an alteration of the Constitution, so that you may be enabled to grant it to them. His views on Abolition were not changed; but he said, and said four years ago, if they had not resisted the right of petition there would have been infinitely less of Abolition than had been.

Mr. CALHOUN. The Senator who has just taken his seat, has assigned a very sensible reason why our ancestors, who framed the Constitution, placed so high a value on the right of petition. It performed a prominent part in the contest leading to the Revolution. Then we were subject colonies, and, as far as the Government of Great Britain was concerned, had no other mode of being heard but by petition. We had no representation in Parliament. But the case is different now. Our Government, in every Department, is under popular control. The people have a right to speak directly to their public functionaries; and it is absurd to say, under this changed condition, that the right is as important as it was then, when it was our only weapon, and that the right is so sacred as to be without limitation. I ask the Senator whether he is ready to carry out his theory of the right. I put three questions to him: Would he present a petition that vilified this body, or any of the individuals of which it is composed? Or would he present a petition to to legalize murder? I wish an answer to these questions.

Mr. TALLMADGE. The Senator asks, would I present a petition that would vilify this body. I tell him I would not. Self-defence would prevent me. As to a petition to abolish the Christian religion, I do not think there would be much harm in the presentation, if he could have it presented to a committee of which the Senator would be chairman.

Mr. CALHOUN. Will the Senator go home and tell his constituents that he is ready to present a petition to abolish Christianity? If so, and I do not mistake their character, they would soon abolish him and his right of petition. But he has acknowledged that the right has limitation. He would not present one vilifying this body or its members, because self-defence would not permit it. But why not receive it, and put it down by a report, as he proposes in the case of Christianity? Again, is the principle of self-defence limited to this body? Is not the defence of religion, morals, the Constitution, and the character and rights of your constituents and the State you represent, as important as that of the defence of ourselves? And why not meet the one at least as promptly and indignantly as the other? Why not close the door, on the principle of self-defence equally against all? It is useless to attempt concealment. The presentation of these incendiary petitions is itself an infraction of the Constitution. All acknowledge—the Senator himself—that the property, which they are presented here to destroy, is guarantied by the Constitution. Now, I ask, if we have the right under the Constitution to hold the property, (which is one question,) have we not also the right to hold it under the same sacred instrument in peace and quiet? Is it not a direct infraction, then, of the Constitution, to present petitions here, in the common council of the Union, and to us, the agents appointed to carry its provisions into effect, and to guard the rights it secures, the professed aim of which is to destroy the property guarantied by the instrument? There can be but one answer to these questions on the part of those who present such petitions; that the right of petition is higher and more sacred than the Constitution and our oaths to preserve and defend it. To such monstrous result does the doctrine lead.

Sir, I understand this whole question. The great mass of both parties to the North are opposed to Abolition: the Democrats almost exclusively; the Whigs less so. Very few are to be found in the ranks of the former; but many in that of the latter. The only importance that the Abolitionists have, is to be found in the fact, that their weight may be felt in elections; and this is no small advantage. The one party is unwilling to lose their weight, but, at the same time, unwilling to be blended with them on the main question; and hence is made this false, absurd, unconstitutional, and dangerous collateral issue on the right of petition. Here is the whole secret. They are willing to play the political game at our hazard and that of the Constitution and the Union, for the sake of victory at the elections. But, to show still more clearly how little foundation there is in the character of our Government for the extravagant importance attached to this right, I ask the Senator what is the true relation between the Government and the people, according to our American conception? Which is principal and which agent? which the master and which the servant? which the sovereign and which the subject? There can be but one answer. We are but the agents—the servants. We are not the sovereign. That resides in the people of the States. How little applicable, then, is this boasted right of petition, under our system, to political questions? Who ever heard of the principal petitioning his agent—of the master his servant—or of the sovereign his subject? The very essence of a petition implies a request from an inferior to a superior. It is not, in fact, a natural growth of our system. It was copied from the British bill of rights, and grew up among a people whose representation was very imperfect, and where the sovereignty of the people was not recognised at all. And yet, even there, this right so much insisted on here, as being boundless as space, was restricted from the beginning, by the very men who adopted it in the British system, in the very manner which has been done in the other branch, this session; and to an extent far beyond. The two Houses of Parliament have again and again passed resolutions against receiving petitions even to repeal taxes; and this, those who formed our Constitution well knew, and yet adopted the provision almost identically contained in the British bill of rights, without guarding against the practice under it. Is not the conclusion irresistible, that they did not deem it inconsistent with the right of "the citizens peaceably to assemble and petition for a redress of grievance," as secured in the Constitution? The thing is clear. It is time that the truth should be known, and this cant about petition, not to redress the grievances of the petitioners, but to create a grievance elsewhere, be put down.

Mr. BROWN said he had not had the remotest idea of entering into a discussion on this subject; but, as a Senator representing a Southern State, he could not in silence hear the decisions of another branch of this Legislature denounced for an act which he deemed eminently judicious and patriotic. It is time that this persevering effort to interfere with Southern institutions should be put an end to. When Congress become satisfied that, under the forms of the Constitution, and to attain objects clearly unconstitutional, efforts are making to destroy the peace and happiness of a portion of the States of this Confederacy, they have a right, nay, it is their duty, to arrest a course so fraught with pernicious consequences. But gentlemen say that this question has been used for political purposes. By whom has it been used for political purposes? The first knowledge he had of the mingling of this question with politics, was in the councils of the Hartford Convention. A portion of the Northern Federalists then endeavored to produce the same prejudice against the Southern States, for political effect, which at this day was attempted in the same quarter, for the same purpose. The Democracy of the North were then, and still continue, true to the Union and the principles upon which it was founded. I agree with gentlemen that it has been used by politicians in more modern times. And by whom? Why, true to their vocation, by the Federal party, though he admitted there were many honorable exceptions. What have the Democratic party to gain by a connection with these fanatics? Nothing! And is this annoyance never to cease? Gentlemen say, receive and refer these petitions, and have a report on them, and then they will cease. Sir, this spirit will never cease while ambition exists, and is ready to seize upon any subject as the means of success.

Mr. B. should not have alluded to this branch, if it had not been alluded to in connection with the political affairs of the country; and he would have been recreant to duty, if he had not attempted to defend his Democratic brethren of the North, who had acted so nobly on this question, from the assault which, elsewhere more especially, had been made upon them on this question of Abolition.

There was no State north of the Potomac, in which the Federal party had obtained an ascendancy in the Legislature, in which resolutions insulting to the South had not been passed; while in every instance where the friends of the Administration had the ascendency, resolutions of a precisely opposite character had been adopted. But from whom do these petitions come? It is generally known, from persons hostile to the Democratic party? When the question for the admission of Arkansas into the Union was decided in this body, every Democratic Senator from the North voted in favor of her admission, while some of the other party voted against it. In the other House, in voting on the same question, parties stood in the same attitude towards each other, as far as regarded the Northern representation.

I know that, notwithstanding all these facts staring them in the face, the care gentlemen from the South who still doubt, or affect to doubt, who are their friends on this question. The time for doubt is passed: the facts which decide the case are numerous and conclusive; and I now make this declaration, that if, with my knowledge of circumstances, I should assist in attempting to delude the people of the South, on a question so vitally important to their interests and safety, I should consider myself guilty of treason to the best interests of that people. If, as a Southern man, with the knowledge I possess in relation to the parties in the North, I should attempt to delude the people of the South as to who were their true friends, I should consider myself, I repeat it again, guilty of treason to their best interests.

Mr. TALLMADGE said he regretted the introduction of this question here as much as the Senator from North Carolina, but it had not been introduced through his instrumentality; but when the Senator talks of any political party in the North being an Abolition party, he talks of what he does not comprehend. There was no such political party there; there was no leading public man there, of any party, who was not willing to maintain the constitutional rights of the South. For himself, he considered the rights of the South on this subject as sacred as his right to his private property. But the gentleman says he considers the presentation of these petitions as an insult. I hope he does not consider it an insult in the person who presents them. Why were not these petitions treated now as they were in the days of the First Congress? Then, a petition was presented from the Anti-Slavery Society of Pennsylvania, of which Benjamin Franklin was the president, and it was referred to a committee, of which James Madison was chairman, who reported that Congress had no power over the subject. If these petitions were treated in the same way, there would be no more danger of these petitioners destroying the property of the people of the South than there would be of taking his property; and if they took the latter they would probably not get much in these Loco Foco times? He regretted that the Senator from South Carolina had characterized the right of petition as he had. He said the people were sovereigns, and, therefore, had no necessity to petition their slaves! Why these metaphysics? The Senator seemed to have in his head the idea of his presenting a petition to one of his own slaves. Was that the analogy? Mr. T. said he rejected it. The people of the United States are sovereigns, and their representatives are called public servants. When they petition, it is the petition, not of masters to slaves, but of freemen to their public servants, and which those servants are bound to hear. The gentleman asked if the right of petition was ever heard of in the representative Governments of ancient Greece and Rome? From what little knowledge he possessed of the histories of those countries, there was but a very short period in which they possessed representative Governments. He would say again, as he had said before, that he did not differ in sentiment with the Senators from North and South Carolina, [Mr. BROWN and Mr. CALHOUN] as to their constitutional right to hold this species of property, but deemed them as sacred as his own rights to private property. As to the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina about the Democratic party, he would tell him that the Democratic party was now in the ascendency in the Empire State. They have the three branches of the Government in that State. We have put down the old Federal party of 1798, and we intend to keep them down; and we will not permit the rights of the States to be interfered with.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he did not rise to make a speech, but to submit a motion. Before he did this, however, he would take leave to make a very brief explanation. Although he had ever carefully avoided to speak of his own part conduct in the Senate in terms which might appear like self commendation, yet, upon the present occasion, he deemed it necessary to refer to his former course upon the subject of Abolition.

In the session of 1835-'6, said Mr. B. when an alarming excitement prevailed on this subject throughout a large portion of the country, I took a decided stand against the Abolitionists. I then presented a memorial from the Caln Quarterly Meeting of the highly respectable religious society of Friends in Pennsylvania, asking Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; and at the time of its presentation, I declared that, upon its reception, I should immediately move that the prayer of the memorialists be rejected. This memorial was received by a vote of 36 to 10; and my motion to reject the prayer of it prevailed, with but six dissenting voices. Since this decision, the Senate had adopted a practice which I think has proved eminently beneficial, because it has afforded us peace and quiet upon this subject. The memorial is presented, objection is made to its reception, and a motion to lay the question of reception upon the table is then immediately made and adopted. This precludes all debate and all agitation.

Now, said Mr. B. in consequence of my conduct here throughout that session, I have borne the brunt of the Abolitionists at home. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky that the danger has passed away, at least in Pennsylvania. The crisis is now over; and the fanaticism which threatened to invade the constitutional rights of the South, and to dissolve the Union, has been nearly extinguished.

The battle has been fought, where it must ever be fought, not in the South, but in the North. It is we of the North who must ever sustain the shock in such a contest. Under these circumstances, I appeal most solemnly to Senators from the slaveholding States, whether they ought not to be governed, in a great degree, by our advice as to the mode in which these Abolition petitions shall be treated. It is impossible, after all which has passed, that they can doubt our devotion to the constitutional rights of the South. Let me assure them, then, that our greatest danger is from agitation here. Excitement is the element in which Abolition lives, and moves, and has its being. A flame kindled in the Capitol would soon pervade the Union. Let a question now be raised upon the abstract right of petition—let the enemies of Abolition in this body divide upon this question, as they probly would, and they will jeopard the great cause, to the maintenance of which they are all devoted, in this most unprofitable strife. The discussion of the Abolition question here can do no possible good, and may do much positive harm. When did fanaticism ever yield to the voice of reason? Let it alone, and it will soon burn out for want of the fuel on which it feeds.

Deeply and solemnly impressed with a conviction of the truth of these sentiments, and for the purpose of arresting this debate, I make the accustomed motion, which cannot be debated, that the question on the reception of this memorial be laid upon the table.

Mr. BROWN here interposed, in the most earnest manner, and urged Mr. BUCHANAN to withdraw his motion, to afford him an opportunity of answering remarks which he considered personal to himself. After much solicitation from him,

Mr. BUCHANAN reluctantly consented to withdraw his motion, at the same time declaring that he would renew it on the very first opportunity after the Senator had made his remarks.

Mr. WEBSTER said he could not permit the opinions expressed by the Senator from South Carolina on the right of petition, to pass without a remark. He says that our institutions have, in a great degree, superseded the right of petition. It is strange, if it were so, that those who formed those institutions should have been so careful in introducing it. He thought it surprising that the Constitution should be so construed as to supersede that portion of the instrument which was most cautiously guarded. With the same propriety might be explained away the correlative rights of freedom of the press and liberty of conscience. The right of petition is only worth using in representative Governments; in despotisms, the subject is permitted to crawl to the foot of the throne; but this could not be called a right of petition. But the Senator says the right of suffrage and the right of instruction render this right of petition unnecessary. Now, the Constitution expressly secures the right of petition, but says not a word about the right of instruction. He was content to hold on to the Constitution, and let gentlemen indulge their peculiar notions about the right of instruction? But it is asked, does a master petition a servant? No individual is a master of Congress. He petitions a power which has the capacity to redress his grievance. He would say one word as to the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] and his friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] that two distinct races of men cannot live in the same community without one being subject to the other. He had not a word to say about distinction of color, as in that case the proposition might be true. But the general proposition that two races cannot live in the same community, was a sentiment that he revolted at. He instanced the case of Louisiana, in which the French Creoles and the Anglo Saxon races had commingled; and said that good Government was all that was necessary to produce this result. He spoke not of colors—that was a distinct question. He thought the arguments of Lord Durham on this subject, which had been alluded to, were founded neither in reason nor philosophy.

Mr. BROWN returned his thanks to the Senator from Pennsylvania for withdrawing his motion, and enabling him to say a few words in reply to the Senator from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] The Senator from New York denies that there is any party in this country associated with Abolition. Notwithstanding that denial, he still believed that Abolition was made use of in the elections in that State. Last year, the popular branch of the Legislature of that State, which was of that party not long since assuming the name of Whig, but which I suppose he would now call Democratic and to which others give a different name, passed a series of resolutions, which, if carried out, would have shaken this Union to its centre. But when they were sent to the other branch of the Legislature, which contained a majority of the friends of this Administration, they were rejected, or at any rate deprived of their obnoxious character by amendments.

Here, sir, was the Democratic, Conservative, Federal Whig branch, introducing and passing these resolutions; and on the other hand, what he called the Democratic members of the other branch, placing their veto on them. This needs no commentary.

And what is the course of parties in Congress? One presenting these petitions, debating them, and agitating the question: the other endeavoring to arrest agitation, and to allay excitement. There is one very distinguished gentleman of the Opposition party—he would not say in what branch of Congress—who presents hundreds of these petitions, and makes the most inflammatory speeches; and yet, forsooth, he says he is not an Abolitionist. If you take their own declarations, none of them are Abolitionists! But the gentleman [Mr. TALLMADGE] has alluded to a party—the Loco Foco party, as he calls them—existing in New York, which, he says, are in favor of a division of property; and says, such is his regard for the right of petition, if they sent petitions here for that purpose, he would deem it his duty to present them. The Federal party is the party who support the principles spoken of by the Senator, by asserting the supremacy of corporations, and justifying their abuses. This is the party who are destroying the rights of property, while the Democratic party wish to preserve them, by establishing a proper standard of value. The party who uphold the paper system, in all its abuses—they are the real agrarians, who trample the rights of property under foot. But we have heard much of the right of petition, and the example of Great Britain is referred to. He would not quote British examples on this floor for imitation, unless they came recommended by principle and reason. Abolition originated in England, and he was not disposed to look to that country for examples, so often quoted by a certain party here. He considered the British Government, while favorable to the nobility and gentry, as the most rapacious and despotic on earth in its operations on the great mass of the people—in plundering the many for the benefit of the few, and as the most perfect invention in any age, by means of which the earnings of labor were appropriated to privileged classes.

But we have heard much of abstractions. Sir, the abstractions come from the other side. We go for a great practical good, while those in opposition themselves deal in abstractions. For years the Federal party to the North have attempted to delude the people of this country by exclaiming that the right of petition was endangered. They know that they cannot exist a day without a panic, either in regard to banks, Abolition, or something else; and now that all other subjects have been worn out, they strive to get one upon the abstract right of petition, in order to enlist partisans under their banner.

The Senator [Mr. TALLMADGE] says that the Democratic party is now in the ascendency in New York. He will find all the surviving members of the Hartford Convention in what he now calls the Democratic party, but which, in former times, was called the Federal party. Nay, the Secretary of the Hartford Convention was the Editor of an organ of that party, in the city of New York, not long since; and one of the latest productions, he was informed, of that distinguished personage, was a life of Thomas Jefferson, but which, in reality, is an infamous libel on the character of that eminent patriot.

Mr. TALLMADGE said there were Loco Focos among his constituents who believed in the propriety of a division of property; and if they would send a petition here, he would present it, and if he could get the Senator from North Carolina to move its reference to a select committee, it would be quickly disposed of. He repeated that there was no Abolition connected with the political party of which he was a member. His most bitter opponent was the Editor of the Friend of Man. This editor, in conjunction with the Loco Focos, had done all he could to prevent his election; and when they came to nominate candidates, the leader of the Loco Focos nominated Gerrit Smith, one of the principal Abolitionists, as his antagonist. Mr. T. said that when the leaders of the Democratic party had turned off from the old track, he had kept straight ahead. Even before he left it, there was so much blue light Federal sm in it, that he frequently thought he smelt brimstone. Indeed, it has been thought that the object of the President in visiting the Sulphur Springs some time since, was to replenish his stock.

Mr. BROWN said, in having introduced the subject of party politics in connection with this question, he had but followed the examples of the Senators from Kentucky and New York, [Messrs. CLAY and TALLMADGE.] But the Senator from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] says the Abolitionists belong to the political party of which I am a member. Sir, now-a-days, nothing need surprise us that comes from a politician; and after what he has just said, and with the facts before us, nothing that can come from that honorable gentleman on this subject, or any other, hereafter, will surprise me. He says the Legislature which elected him was Democratic, and that the party opposed to him was the Abolition party, &c. If he says so, any declarations which he may make hereafter will not satisfy me of their correctness.

But when the party that he has gone over to had attempted to throw firebands into the Senate, who were they that voted them down? Were they not the friends of the Administration?

Mr. B. said that it was a maxim among lawyers, that the record never lies. On the question of the admission of Arkansas into the Union, the journals of the Senate show that every Democratic Senator from the North voted for it, while the votes in opposition to it were entirely from the enemies of the Administration. In the House of Representatives, almost the entire Democratic vote of the North was given in favor of the same measure, while the opposition vote from the same quarter was found recorded pretty generally against it! Here was a great practical test question, on the admission of a slave State into the Union, which exhibited parties to the North on the Abolition question in their true positions, and about which there could be no mistake, unless it was among those who chose either to be deceived themselves, or to deceive others!

The gentleman, he thought, must rely largely on his powers of persuasion, if he supposed that he could succeed in making the impression which his remarks were intended to make. Is there a single Legislature, with a majority of the party to which the gentleman has gone over, and been received with open arms, which has passed resolutions calculated to quiet this irritating subject? On the contrary, was there a single Democratic Legislature to the North that had not sustained the rights of the South on this question?

But the gentleman says that the Abolitionists are not his friends. Then they are not so complimentary to him, as he was to them. But did not the party which elected him, elect Mr. Bradish, an open and avowed Abolitionist, as Lieutenant Governor of the State of New York? I am aware of Federal ingenuity and trickery. It is by the Abolitionists, with them, as it is by the Federalists. If one Federalist, out of a hundred, comes over to the Democratic ranks, it is immediately pointed out by Federal papers and Federal orators as an evidence that the old Federalists are all members of our party! And so, if one out of a hundred of the Abolitionists, acts with the Administration party, why, according to Federal logic, it is conclusive to show that the Abolitionists are acting with the Democrats.

He believed there was not an intelligent Federalist in the Union, whatever opinions they may advance to the contrary, for political effect, that did not know the Abolitionists, as a body, were generally political auxiliaries of their own party, and enemies of the Democratic party. But we are taunted with bowing down to the Executive yoke. Sir, the greatest act of subserviency to Executive will, charged by the organs of the party of which the gentleman is now a member, but which he thought a noble vindication of the principles of liberty against bank usurpation, was the expunging resolution. And was not the gentlemen shoulder to shoulder with us in that transaction? An act which he no doubt would fain expunge from his history, as his Federal friends have shown such readiness to forgive what, to them, at one time, was viewed as an unpardonable transgression. But by whom are we taunted with bowing down to Executive usurpation? By the slaves of banking corporations—by those who have shown themselves ready, in effect, to acknowledge the supremacy of bank rule in this country. It ill became them to taunt those with being the slaves of the Executive will, who had been, and were now, endeavoring to preserve to the people of this country their own sovereignty, and the right to rule themselves, instead of being ruled by a combination of political and moneyed interests.

Mr. SMITH of Conn. said he should not have asked the indulgence of the Senate to express his views upon this subject, had he not supposed that a wrong construction might be given to his motives for the vote which he felt bound to give upon the motion before the Senate. The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] would seem to indicate, by the warmth of his answer, on my attempting to obtain the floor, that I was attempting to trench upon the time he had marked out for his own consumption. The gentleman need not fear any such disposition or attempt on my part. I was aware of the importance he had attached to the political character which he is attempting to sustain, by showing that he is a Democrat; and hence his great anxiety to give the impression at this time. I am sure, for one, I should feel disposed to give him all the time and opportunity he desired for that purpose; for, as it regards myself, I need no time, here or elsewhere, to impress that fact upon the public mind. All who know me, know I am a Democrat; let it be to my credit or discredit, no one will question it, friend or foe; and no exposure or argument of mine would make it more satisfactory. I should, therefore, have no motive for taking up the time he deemed so precious, to give himself a political character, for which he seemed to fear he had not full credit. Sir, I am disposed to approve of the rule adopted in the other end of the Capitol, in relation to Abolition petitions. When this exciting question was before the Senate, and discussed during the last Congress, I was disposed to receive the petitions and lay them on the table, and do no more with them. When the motion was made to lay the motion for reception on the table, I voted against that motion, hoping if the petition was received, and laid on the table, and nothing further done with it then, the petitioner would consider it as a determination of the Senate not to investigate the subject, and, thereafter, desist petitioning Congress for relief of supposed grievances, when Congress had, on mature deliberation, decided that if the petitioners considered slavery a moral evil, then it was not such a grievance as Congress could take cognizance of. But, sir, I am satisfied, and am constrained to say, that, in my belief, regardless of consequences, which I fear would be a dissolution of the Union, with the countless evils and misery which would follow in its train, that the Abolitionists are determined to agitate this question, however indulgent, and however much Congress may be disposed to gratify the petitioners, short of setting itself about abolishing slavery in the States, which are entirely sovereign and independent of the General Government in regard to that subject; and over which the Government has no more control than it has over the free States, to coerce them to institute and maintain slavery against their will. I am, therefore, for shutting the door wholly against, and excluding, the incendiary petitions; and though many of the petitioners may be, and probably are, honest, many, I have reason to fear, are not so. However the Northern people may deprecate the existence of slavery in the States, and however unjust they may consider it in the abstract, I cannot believe that intelligent and honest men can think they are doing justice to the people of this happy Republic, when they so obstinately and perseveringly persist in presenting their inflammatory petitions upon this subject, after Congress has so many times, and so decidedly, expressed its disapprobation of them, and its unwillingness to aid in a scheme fraught with such danger; and upon grounds both of unconstitutionality and inexpediency. I do not intend, Mr. President, to deny the right of any citizen of the United States to petition his Government for a redress of any real or supposed grievances. I intend to award to him the right in its fullest extent. I have no doubt, sir, but this is an inherent right in any citizen of a Republican Government like this, and which is not strengthened in the least, in my opinion, by a grant of the right in the Constitution. The political power which moves the Government of the people in all its operations is placed, and resides in the people; every citizen of the Republic holds a portion of it in his own hands; and those who administer the Government, are but the agents or servants of the people, authorized only to wield this power temporarily during the time the people have confided it to their hands, but not make a final disposition of it; and they have, at any time, an undoubted right to approach their agents, the public functionaries, with any complaints or grievances they may have to lay before them. But if the Government think their grievances are not real, and of which, among other things, they are selected and authorized by the people to judge, they have a right to make such a disposition of them as, in their opinion, is right and just: but still, if the people feel themselves aggrieved by the decision of their agents, they have a remedy at the ballot box, and which they will take care to exercise. Sir, it is claimed by the Senator from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] that the Abolitionists are not known as a political party. Political parties are natural consequences of a Republican and Representative Government; their regular formation shows the political body to be in healthy action; they act as sentinels over the institutions and rights of the people; it is by these political conflicts and strifes that the official conduct of the people's servants, their functionaries, is investigated, and exposed to the view of the people, and which enables them more correctly to judge who are worthy of confidence and faithful to their trust, and who are not; and by their agency, the alarm is given to the people when their rights are invaded. No man ought to desire that we should be free from political parties; no free Government can exist without them. At the same time I am free to admit that political parties carry along with them their evils as well as their benefits, but the latter vastly preponderate.

There cannot be, in the nature of parties arising under and growing out of a free Government, but two; each having for its object, professedly, the good of the people, but disagreeing in the mode in which the good shall be produced; all others partake, in their sentiments and in their tendencies, of one or the other, and are auxiliaries to them, and finally melt into and become united to that party to which their principles naturally incline them. Every man has a right to choose for himself which party he will unite himself with, and no one has a right to say, Why do ye so? Every man who means to make himself useful, will unite himself with one or the other of the parties; and, if he is a patriot and philanthropist, will endeavor to promote that form of government which he believes will be productive of the greatest good, and dispense to man the greatest degree of social happiness. The political parties which exist here are coeval with the Government; they have been of long standing; their principles were early formed, and have undergone no change; they are now well understood by the people, and their relative merits easily estimated. The principles of the Federal party were fully developed under the elder Adams, and rejected by the people. Since then, that party, knowing that their principles were not acceptable to the people, have laid aside their principles, and kept them concealed behind a closely drawn curtain, and have acted altogether upon expedients; while the Democratic party have kept on in the even tenor of their way, and endeavoring, by all wholesome means, at all times, to fully develope, and bring to the full view of the people, their principles. It is the object of one party to conceal their principles; and of the other, to give as great publicity to theirs as possible. The party which acts upon principle, has nothing to do but first to ascertain what the principles are, and then follow them; and hence the party is never segregated, or broken up, by a difference in opinion as to expedients most proper to be adopted for its guidance or direction; while the tendency of the other party, which acts by expedients, is ever to separate; and though none of the sub-parties ever lose sight of their principles, which they intend to act upon, if they gain the ascendency, they many times proceed without much union or harmony in their actions. It is for this reason that none of the sub-parties are ever auxiliaries to the Democratic party, or ever, in the end, unite with them; they have no natural affinity for that party. It is a well known fact, that whenever a Democrat can be induced to adopt the Abolition faith, which is now and then the case, but very seldom, he straightway goes to the Federal party, and unites his vote, politically, with theirs, and is as much of a stranger to Democracy thereafter, as if he had never known it. The honorable Senator [Mr. TALLMADGE] said, if I understood him right, that the Abolitionists formed no distinct political party, and that they did not act with the party that he did. He seems to be very anxious, apparently, to keep them at arm's length, and push them off; and why is this? If their combination and objects are laudable and commendable, why repudiate them? Why not receive them with open arms, and embrace them, not only as political, but patriotic and philanthropic brethren, and firmly wed and unite them to their party? The reason is perfectly obvious, why they dare not openly receive them, while they privately have their aid. They are aware that their cause is viewed by the great body of the people as an unjustifiable and unholy one, fraught with danger to this Government: and no political party dare openly to embrace them, more than they would the bohon upas; it will be equally deadly in its poison, to whom or whatever it comes in contact with. That political party which shall receive it will feel its blight, and wither under its influence. The honorable Senator says the party to which he belongs has never had the benefit of the Abolition votes; that they have never been united with theirs. I would ask the Senator, why in selecting candidates for the two first offices in the State of New York, one was taken from the Abolitionists, and one from the anti-Abolitionists? I would ask him further, whether either of these officers could have been elected, but for the votes of the Abolitionists? I would ask him again, whether the ticket was not so arranged, for the express purpose of obtaining the Abolition vote? I would ask him further, whether General Harrison could have been nominated for the Presidency, had it not been for Abolitionists, and whether he could have been nominated without the activity and aid of Mr. Weed, their State printer at Albany, in bringing all the Abolitionists to his aid? These are facts that will speak for themselves; and there is little use in denying them. The Democrats understand they have not had their votes, and the Federalists understand they have had them. The honorable Senator here said that Ben. Franklin was an Abolitionist; this is but the echo of all the Abolition papers; this has been blazoned forth in all their papers in capital letters. Do they believe that if Doctor Franklin was now alive, from what they knew of his character as a patriot, statesman, and philosopher, that he would join them in their mad career, in a crusade against the peaceful inhabitants of the slave States; and unite with them in despoiling them of their property, which was guarantied to them in the political compact under which so many millions of people are enjoying the most perfect civil and religious liberty? Doctor Franklin was understood to be such an Abolitionist as nearly all the Northern people are, and perhaps a great share of the Southern people. They believe slavery to be a political evil; and, without taking into consideration the moral character of it, they are willing, so far as they can constitutionally, to aid in removing it from our land, at least, as a civil inconvenience or evil. But they understand the right to hold this species of property in the States existed at the time our Constitution was formed; and that that right was never surrendered by the States, or taken away from them; and however it may be viewed in a political or moral point of view, it is, beyond their reach; and therefore they consider all officious intermeddling with it as tending to destroy the Union, and to involve the whole nation in ruin. As much as I deprecate the existence of the evil, I believe, as it is here among us, it is much better for the slaves, and much better for the whole community, that negroes should remain slaves. So far as I am acquainted with them, either in the free or slave States, the slaves appear the most moral, most cheerful, and most useful. There are probably nearly three millions of slaves in the United States, uneducated, and unused to taking care of themselves, and probably altogether incompetent to do it. If they were all emancipated at once, they would form about as large a population as the whole Union had at the close of the Revolutionary war; their tendency would be to the North, where they are taught to believe their peculiar friends are. They would be nearly twice as numerous as the whole population of the New England States. What could be reasonably expected to result from their diffusion over the States, other than vices and crimes of the most pernicious and destructive character. It is, I believe, ascertained that a great proportion of the convicts in the various prisons of the States are ignorant and unlettered men, and that most of the crimes committed are ascribed to that circumstance. They would be commingled with the now peaceful and wholesome inhabitants of the North, and their vices communicated wherever the people were susceptible of it, filling our land with a moral malaria; and instead of congratulating ourselves with being at least as moral as any part of the Union, or of the world, we should be a perfect sample of immorality.

The honorable Senator from New York says there is a class of Loco Focos in the city of New York who are agrarians, and are endeavoring to bring about such a state of society as will enable them to divide the property of the wealthy people, and take a portion of it to themselves. This has been so long used by the Federal party, as a bugbear to frighten the timid, that there is now no man so ignorant but he will laugh at the man who is silly enough to declare it. But the Senator says, if such people were to send him a petition for that purpose, to be presented to Congress, he would do it. This case, I suppose, is presented for the purpose of illustration; and I think it very judiciously selected. There would be as much reason in presenting this to Congress, and asking its aid, as the Abolition petitions, and I think would not be more absurd. I think it a very fair illustration. I think it makes perfectly clear that which to but few appeared doubtful before—and that is, these Abolitionists are entitled to no relief here, in the manner asked for. But the honorable Senator over the way, [Mr. WEBSTER,] in the discussion of this question, has asked whether Englishmen, Frenchmen, and others speaking different languages, could not live together in these States peaceably, harmoniously and prosperously, each retaining his original language, and national habits. He does not make the direct application, and seems rather to deny that he has any disposition to have the whites and blacks amalgamate; but he, at heart, must intend to inculcate the idea that the black race can live here with the white, and mingle with them in all the social enjoyments of life, except to amalgamate; and this case represents, I presume, an illustration of their position. But I will take the case which the honorable Senator has supposed; and what would have been our condition as a nation at this time, had all the foreigners who have emigrated to this country retained their original language, and national prejudices and habits, and taught and impressed them upon their children? Can any one doubt but we would have presented a second Babel? Sir, place in juxtaposition the whites and blacks, and make them all equally eligible to high social stations—you have only to look to Mexico for the consequences, where you will have a perfect illustration of it. A people occupying the fairest portion of the globe, with all the natural advantages necessary to make one of the most powerful nations on earth, so mixed up, divided into castes, and degraded, that they are incapable of binding themselves together, and forming such a Government as to give any security to party or person.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he thought the day had been very unprofitably spent, and he did not intend to prolong the discussion, but he wished to make a remark in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, as to the mingling of the French and Anglo-Saxon races in Louisiana. He said there had been considerable difficulty in preserving peaceful relations among them, and nothing but the greatest forbearance on the part of the Americans, and on the part of some of the French, had prevented collisions. He said that both the great parties had occasionally profited by Abolition, and instanced the recent election of a Democratic Governor in Massachusetts by their aid. He believed that, if put to the vote, there was not a single Senator who would not vote to maintain the rights of the South. Their institutions, whether right or wrong, were, from their nature, incurable. But he did not wish to mix it up with collateral questions. He alluded to the resolutions passed by the House; and said when he first heard of its passage, he had feared, and he yet entertained fears, about its operation, and thought its tendency would be to increase, instead of allaying, excitement. Heretofore, Congress had acted as a safety valve in passing off this excitement. He never had believed there was any danger, if we conducted ourselves here as wise and prudent statesmen; but why should we identify Abolition with rights guarantied by the Constitution. If we desire safety, let us stand upon the broad platform of the Constitution, and this would be the best guarantee of protection for the rights of the South.

Mr. CALHOUN. I rise to say that I have heard the remarks of the Senator who has just concluded, [Mr. CLAY,] with deep regret. I make no impeachment of motive, but am compelled to say that what he has said, and the course he so strongly recommends in regard to these petitions, are calculated, especially at this moment, to do much harm. If we should have the folly to adopt it, to receive these slanderous and incendiary petitions, to take jurisdiction over the subject, and to argue the case with their authors, as the Senator advises, it would, in the end, prove fatal to us. I know this question to the bottom. I have viewed it under every possible aspect. There is no safety but in prompt, determined, and uncompromising defence of our rights—to meet the danger on the frontier. There all rights are strongest, and more especially this. The moral is like the physical world. Nature has encrusted the exterior of all organic life, for its safety. Let that be broke through, and it is all weakness within. So in the moral and political world. It is on the extreme limits of right that all wrong and encroachments are the most sensibly felt and easily resisted. I have acted on this principle throughout, in this great contest. I took my lessons from the patriots of the Revolution. They met wrong promptly, and defended right against the first encroachment. To set here, and hear ourselves and constituents, and their rights and institutions, (essential to their safety,) assailed from day to day—denounced by every epithet calculated to degrade and render us odious; and to meet all this in silence, or, still worse, to reason with the foul slanderers, would eventually destroy every feeling of pride and dignity, and sink us, in feelings, to the condition of the slaves they would emancipate. And this the Senator advises us to do. Adopt it, and the two Houses would be converted into halls to debate our rights to our property, and whether, in holding it, we were not thieves, robbers, and kidnappers; and we are to submit to this in order to quiet the North! I tell the Senator that our Union, and our high moral tone of feeling on this subject at the South, are infinitely more important to us than any possible effect that his course could have at the North; and that, if we could have the weakness to adopt his advice, it would even fail to effect the object intended.

It is proper to speak out. If this question is left to itself, unresisted by us, it cannot but terminate fatally to us. Our safety and honor are in the opposite direction—to take the highest ground, and maintain it resolutely. The North will always take position below us, be ours high or low. They will yield all that we will, and something more. If we go for rejection, they will at first insist on receiving, on the ground of respect for petition. If we yield that point, and receive petitions, they will go for reference, on the ground that it is absurd to receive and not to act, as it truly is. If we go for that, they will next insist on reporting and discussing; and, if that, the next step will be to make concession—to yield the point of abolition in this District; and so on, till the whole process is consummated, each succeeding proving more easy than its predecessor. The reason is obvious. The Abolitionists understand their game. They throw their votes to the party most disposed to favor them. Now, sir, in the hot contest of party in the Northern section, on which the ascendency in their several States and the General Government, may depend, all the passions are roused to the greatest height in the violent struggle, and aid sought in every quarter. They would forget us in the heat of battle; yes, the success of the election, for the time, would be more important than our safety, unless we, by our determined stand on our rights, cause our weight to be felt, and satisfy both parties that they have nothing to gain by courting those who aim at our destruction. As far as this Government is concerned, that is our only remedy. If we yield that, if we lower our stand to permit partisans to woo the aid of those who are striking at our interests, we shall commence a descent, in which there is no stopping place short of total abolition, and with it our destruction.

A word in answer to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] He attempted to show that the right of petition was peculiar to free Government. So far is the assertion from being true, that it is more appropriately the right of despotic Governments; and the more so, the more absolute and austere. So far from being peculiar, or congenial, to free popular States, it degenerates under them, necessarily, into an instrument, not of redress for the grievances of the petitioners, but, as has been remarked, of assault on the rights of others, as in his case. That I am right in making the assertion, I put it to the Senator—have we not a right, under the Constitution, to our property in our slaves? Would it not be a violation of the Constitution to divest us of that right? Have we not a right to enjoy, under the Constitution, peaceably and quietly, our acknowledged rights guarantied by it, without annoyance? The Senator assents. He does but justice to his candor and intelligence. Now, I ask him, how can he assent to receive petitions, whose object is to annoy and disturb our right, and, of course, in direct infraction of the Constitution?

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAPPAN] in refusing to present these incendiary and unconstitutional petitions, has adopted a course truly constitutional and patriotic, and, in my opinion, the only one that is so. I deeply regret that it has not been followed by the Senator from Kentucky in the present instance. Nothing short of it can put a stop to the mischief, and do justice to one-half of the States of the Union. If adopted by others, we shall soon hear no more of Abolition. The responsibility of keeping alive this agitation, must rest on those who may refuse to follow so noble an example.

Mr. WRIGHT said he had never before, he believed, attempted to address the Senate when an Abolition petition was under consideration. If he justly appreciated his duty, it was quite likely he should remain silent now, though he had not risen to discuss Abolitionism, or to protract this very desultory debate. Still, some remarks had fallen from his colleague, and from the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] which his duty to absent friends seemed to him to require him to notice.

The honorable Senator [Mr. CLAY] has taken the liberty to refer to a vote lately given in the other branch of Congress in reference to the disposition of these petitions; to allude to the fact that some of the members of the New York delegation, the political friends of Mr. W. had voted for the rule adopted in the House; and then had stated that all parties in the Legislature of the State were now expressing their decided reprehension of that vote. He should not feel at liberty to make the action of either of these legislative bodies the subject of remark upon this occasion, had he not been forced to do so by the course pursued by the honorable Senator; and he wished it to be distinctly understood, that, in making the short reply he intended, he was not acting as the authorized apologist or defender of the friends who had given the vote complained of. If the vote required apology, they would be found ready to make it for themselves. If it required defence, they were much better able, from character and talent and influence, to defend themselves, than he was to defend them. They were responsible for their acts to the constituents who had sent them here, not to himself, or to this body.

Still, as the honorable Senator had referred to the vote and to the action of the State Legislature, not this year simply, but the last also, it was proper in itself, and due to those who were censured, that he should state the facts, as he understood them to exist. The Senator had spoken of the expression of the Legislature of New York last year, upon this subject oft he disposition of Abolition petitions in Congress, as having followed a political revolution in the State, and of the form of that expression. He must remind the gentleman that the expression to which he alluded as having been made last year, was made in but one branch of the New York Legislature. The political revolution of which he spoke had not then reached the State Senate, and that body did not unite in the expression in favor of these petitioners. The House of Assembly, the popular branch of the Legislature, was then in the hands of the political friends of the Senator; and it did make a strong expression, supposed to favor the Abolitionists. It did declare the ATHERTON resolutions, so called, a denial of the right of petition. He did not now recollect the exact form of the resolutions, or the substance of the expression beyond this point, but as to this he was sure he could not be mistaken. The ATHERTON resolutions were denounced, because it was said they were a denial of the right of petition. What disposition did the ATHERTON resolutions make of Abolition petitions? They were to be received and immediately laid upon the table, without reading or printing, and without debate. This was the denial of the right of petition last year, according to the expressed sense of the Whig branch of the New York Legislature.

Now, certain of the Democratic members of the House of Representatives from that State, had voted to establish a rule of that House, pressed upon them upon the motions of prominent Whigs, by which these petitions were not to be received. In other words, they had voted for a rule which was, in fact and in terms, just what their opponents in the Legislature of their State, one year ago, declared to be the true and practical effect of the ATHERTON resolutions. This was what these members had done, and his object was accomplished in giving the facts. He knew not what either party in the Legislature of the present year were doing upon this subject, except that he had noticed in the public papers that some resolutions had been introduced into the popular branch of that Legislature, by a prominent Federal member, censuring those who had voted for the rule lately adopted in the House of Representatives. If there had been action upon them, the account of it had not met his notice.

His honorable colleague had discussed at some length the politics of their State, and of the various parties in it; the questions, which were Democratic, and which Federal; which were, and which were not Abolition; and the like, and had pronounced his conclusions with some positiveness. In doing this, he had, as Mr. W. thought, done injustice to a political friend of his, or he would not have entered into the discussion. He understood his honorable colleague to say that the member of the popular branch of the present Legislature of their State, who was, at its organization, the candidate for Speaker of the Administration party in the House, had, upon the late election of a United States Senator, and when his colleague was elected, voted for a prominent Abolitionist, a gentleman by the name of Gerrit Smith. If he correctly understood the remarks of his colleague, this vote was said to have been given by the gentleman alluded to upon the open viva voce vote for Senator in the House of which the gentleman was a member. Did his colleague so state?

[Mr. TALLMADGE replied, yes, that was the way I understood it.]

Mr. W. said he had not made this inquiry thus minutely, for the purpose of contradicting it upon his own responsibility, as he had no personal knowledge how the fact was; but he had done so for the purpose of expressing his belief that the statement was erroneous, and giving the grounds of that belief.

He well remembered that, pending the proceedings in the Legislature of the State, touching the election of a Senator, a report sprung up in this city, and in one wing of this Capitol, that all the friends of the Administration in the popular branch of that Legislature had voted for this ardent Abolitionist, this Gerrit Smith, as their candidate for the Senate of the United States. The rumor produced deep feeling here. He was called upon by a great number of members of Congress, from all quarters of the Union, for information as to the fact. He had none to communicate. He had received no intimation of any such action on the part of his political friends; but the mails from the North were deranged by the stormy and severe weather of the period, and he was unable to say what action had been had, or what information others might have received. He entertained the most confident belief that the report was false, and so stated to his friends, but he could not give it authorized contradiction. This report, however, necessarily led him to examine that vote with deep interest and great care, when it did reach him. The Albany Argus, a public journal to which his colleague had alluded as a leading Federal paper, was his authority, and was it Federal, Democratic, or Democratic Republican, which last his colleague seemed to suppose the real name of his party, it was authority upon which he relied with a quiet confidence. The vote given, upon the election of a Senator, in both branches of the Legislature, he found in the columns of that paper in detail; the name of every member voting, and the name of the candidate voted for by each, being distinctly stated. He examined the account with care, and could not say he felt much surprise when he perceived that not one single individual of any party had given his vote for the supposed formidable Abolition candidate, Gerrit Smith.

He could not, however, in justice to his own feelings, leave this matter here, and permit the inference that the mistake of his colleague was wholly without foundation. He would, therefore, relate what he had understood had taken place at some stage of the proceedings preliminary to the election of a Senator. He supposed the account had appeared in the public papers, but he had not seen it there, and related it from mere report. It was this: a law or resolution was before the Legislature, designed to prescribe the time and manner of electing a Senator. To members of the minority of the House, other candidates, taken from the ranks of their political opponents, were more acceptable than his colleague. Some of these members proposed to make the election directly, by inserting the name of the Senator in the bill or resolution, and thus declaring the election, instead of prescribing the time and manner for future action. Pursuing this feeling, the names of a variety of candidates were proposed, and among them Gerrit Smith, his Abolitionism out of the question, a most bitter opponent of this Administration. That name might have come from the gentleman alluded to by his colleague, but it was under such circumstances, and for such objects, as he verily believed, if it came from him at all, which fact he could not assert. It was a choice among his enemies, not his voluntary preference as a politician, or a citizen, as his viva voce vote upon the election should have been. This explanation of the error of his colleague he had given, as he had before stated, rather from rumor than from any referable authority; but he did not doubt it was the real explanation, and the only one of which his statement was susceptible.

He was now brought to the apparent object of the remarks of his colleague, and that was the point of most materiality and most delicacy, the interests of others having been disposed of. Why was the statement of his colleague made, but to show that his friends, and the friends of the Administration in the North, are the Abolitionists there? He could see no other object, and other portions of the remarks of his colleague seemed to him to have a similar object and tendency.

In reference to all such remarks, calculated to produce personal irritation, he would take this occasion to say to his colleague, that it was now something more than six years since they had taken their seats together in this body; that their public acts had been known to the Senate, if not to their constituents and the country; that it was, therefore, folly for them to discuss the question here which was a Democrat, which was a Federalist, or which was a Democratic Republican in politics. Their acts, not their words, must determine that point, and the Senate itself would judge, independently of their impressions, what the proper classification of each was. So also with the question of Abolitionism. His action upon that disturbing subject was known to this body and the country. If it made him an Abolitionist, it was in vain for him to reason against the conclusion. If it did not, any remonstrances and declarations from him against the charge, come from what quarter it might, was unnecessary here. So with the President of the United States. His declarations and acts and votes as to these petitions, and this whole subject, were perfectly known to every individual they addressed; and was it necessary for him, as the avowed personal and political friend of that officer, as he had been since he had had the honor of a seat here, and still continued to be, was it necessary for him to defend the President against the charge of Abolitionism? Not here! not here!

Why, then, Mr. W. asked, were these points debated here, upon such an occasion, and these charges directly made, or impliedly made, by his colleague? During the whole of their public service together hitherto, however wide might have been their political differences of opinion, it gave him sincere pleasure to state that there had not been one particle of personal unkindness between his colleague and himself. This condition of their personal relations he earnestly hoped might continue; and to that end he would now, as he had upon all former occasions, carefully abstain from all remarks calculated to excite unkind feeling. He hoped his colleague would imitate him in this, and relieve them from the necessity of disturbing the Senate by their personal or local differences. They had both had experience enough in the body to know that all such collisions were unpleasant to the members of the Senate. Should they, then, thus afflict them? For himself, nothing but a sense of self-respect could induce him to do it. When they came there together, they were political friends. Those members from other States, whom he had found there as political friends, and who yet remained there, with very few exceptions, were yet personal and political friends. Those whom he had found as political opponents, with exceptions still less numerous, were at this moment his respected opponents in the body. Still he had experienced personal kindness from all, as he knew his colleague had also; and should they now strive to make all unhappy by their personal or local collisions? He would not lead in such a course, and, if compelled to follow, it would be with reluctance and regret.

He had never charged Federalism upon his colleague, nor had he charged Abolitionism upon his party, notwithstanding their course in the last Legislature. He was not in the habit of characterizing men or parties by names, as epithets. He chose to state facts, and let conclusions follow. His colleague had referred, with some triumph, to a political revolution in the State. As a fact, he could state that that revolution brought into office and place a Lieutenant Governor, who was an Abolitionist, as far as his responses to the Abolition committee could make him one. Yet he was not disposed, even upon that fact, to pronounce the whole party Abolitionists, nor would he do so. He preferred to let acts and principles and associations determine these points, as he did, who were Democrats and who were Federalists. The truth and the facts were his material reliance for himself and his friends.

Mr. TALLMADGE said he would take the explanation of his colleague, as he thought the variation was of no material importance. He coincided in the sentiment that this was not the proper place for political explanations between himself and colleague. His colleague, some years since, in his usual complacent way, told him that as to their political differences, their common constituents would settle that question. They have settled it, and settled it three times over. They have pronounced their opinion of this destructive Administration, and of the Sub-Treasury bill, which, in his haste to get it through this body, the patriotic zeal of the chairman of the Committee on Finance had impelled him to override the common courtesies of legislation. The personal relations of himself and his colleague had always been of a friendly nature, and on his part they should continue so; but he was not to be read lectures to by his colleague, and it was not necessary to remind him of their personal relations.

Mr. WRIGHT said he was aware of his trespass upon the feelings of the Senate in again throwing himself before it. He rose to reply to a single remark of his colleague, and but one; and he did that because he was convinced, without an explanation, that remark would be misunderstood and misconstrued to the prejudice, as well of his colleague as himself.

The remark to which he alluded was, that he had been wanting in courtesy in his action in relation to the Independent Treasury bill. If his colleague referred to courtesy to the Senate, as towards those who were members of the body when that bill was acted upon, he had to say to him that those were points he could not discuss with him; that the Senate, as it was at the time, and those who were Senators at the time, were his judges as to the propriety or impropriety of his course upon the passage of the bill in question. If any of those gentlemen, who were his co-actors and his witnesses, had charges to make against him for the manner in which his duties were discharged in relation to that measure, it would be his duty, as it would his pleasure, to listen to them, and to admit their justice or show their injustice, as the facts might warrant; but by others he could not be called to account for his courtesy, or want of it, to them.

If his colleague intended to charge want of courtesy towards himself, as he, Mr. W. was informed, that charge had been made by friends of his colleague at the seat of Government of their State, it was proper that the Senate, and their common constituents, should understand upon what foundation such a charge must rest, and upon what facts it must be sustained, if sustained at all. To make that explanation was his present object.

The bill in question finally passed the Senate on Thursday of the week, he believed the 23d day of January last. The order for engrossment was made on the Friday previous. By the mail which arrived from the North, on the evening of Saturday, the 25th of January, he received from his colleague a letter, dated at the Astor House, in the city of New York, on the 23d day of the month, the very day on which the bill finally passed the Senate. This letter gave him the first information of the ill health of his colleague, and of his having been detained by sickness, when on his way to take his seat here. The letter contained a request from his colleague to himself to have the final question upon this bill postponed, until he could be in his place. In a few moments after the letter reached his hands, he learned that the same conveyance which brought the letter to him, brought also his colleague to the city.

These are the facts. He had spoken of dates from memory, but believed he was not mistaken. And under this state of facts he was well informed that a friend of his colleague had reported at Albany that this request had been made from his colleague to him, and that he had refused the delay asked for. He would not suspect his colleague of having been instrumental in giving existence or circulation to the falsehood, but, without this explanation, those who had heard the statement, and should see the remark of his colleague to which he was now replying, would be likely to connect the present charge of want of courtesy, with this story of the letter; and to all, such his silence under the charge would be considered as an admission of its truth, and of its applicability to the report referred to. To prevent that consequence to his colleague or himself, was his present object, and having accomplished that, he had nothing more to say.

Mr. TALLMADGE said he intended no allusion to his letter in the remarks he had made, nor was any statement of the kind, mentioned by his colleague, made on his (Mr. T's) authority. He acknowledged that the letter reached Washington the same evening as he did himself.

Mr. HUBBARD remarked, that he wished to say a few words upon this subject, and the Senate might rest assured that they should be but few at this hour of the day—(4 o'clock, p. m.) He deeply regretted that this debate had so unnecessarily arisen. He was of opinion that it was better to let well enough alone, than further to agitate this exciting question. But a debate had arisen, and had arisen in consequence of the presentation of a memorial to the Senate by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] upon the subject of domestic slavery and the slave trade; and instead of disposing of that memorial according to the well established practice of the Senate, an extraordinary discussion had grown out of its presentment, which, for one, he deeply regretted. But so it was; and he could not now permit this debate to end, and the question to be put to rest, at this time, without replying to some observations which had been made by Senators, touching the course which some of his particular friends, and a portion of the delegation from his own State in the other House, had recently taken upon the resolution presented by an honorable member from the State of Maryland upon this disturbing subject. He was satisfied with the course which the Senate had adopted for its guidance in relation to this description of memorials; and he was well assured that the people perfectly well understood the necessity, propriety, and effect, of the rule of practice which had been adopted for the action of this body upon Abolition petitions. That rule had, in his judgment, produced the most happy and quieting results; and, for one, he would not feel disposed, unnecessarily, to interfere therewith. What have been the results? If Senators will only consult the journals of this body, they cannot entertain one solitary doubt that the most beneficial results have already been produced. Is it not a fact that the very memorial offered this morning is among the very few which have found their way to this chamber during the present session? How was it formerly? How was it before the adoption of the rule? Not a morning, scarcely, passed, but memorials following memorials, asking for the abolition of slavery, were pressed upon the consideration of the Senate.

Such, then, had been the effect most distinctly experienced under the rule of practice already adopted. What is the practical operation of the rule? Are the petitions read? Are they printed? Are they referred? No. In truth, whether they ever find their way to the Secretary's table, is doubted by some. The question to receive is not directly put, but a sideway movement is made at once to lay upon the table the motion to receive, so as to prevent all debate, and thus ends the matter; and it may be asked, what earthly benefit do these memorialists now realize from sending these Abolion memorials to the Senate? None. The Senate, by their action, most emphatically say they will not act upon them; that these memorialists ask for a redress of grievances, which are imaginary, not real, in no way affecting them, and with which they, in truth, have no concern. The Senate say that these memorialists ask for that which it would be dangerous to the peace, harmony, and perpetuity of the Union, to consider. They therefore, unhesitatingly, so dispose of them as in effect to prevent all consideration and action upon them. This is now the course of the Senate upon Abolition memorials; and, as he had before observed, the effect had been most salutary. It had prevented all agitation here upon this subject; and agitation was what was desired, was what was even declared to be a desirable object; and, as debate and discussion could not now arise under the rule of practice of the Senate, as now understood, Abolition memorialists had almost entirely ceased to press their complaints here in this branch of Congress. He perfectly agreed with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] that there was no diversity of opinion among the States of New England as to the constitutional right of the slaveholding States to maintain their domestic institutions undisturbed. The sentiment was general, if not universal, in his section of the Union, that it would be a flagrant usurpation of power, and a gross violation of the Constitution, to interfere directly or indirectly with this right of property in the slaveholding States. Slavery there exists; and it is not the feeling of New England, as far as he was advised, to take any course which should disturb the relation subsisting between master and slave. New England has no system of involuntary bondage sanctioned by her laws; and the Senator of Kentucky is right when he says that there is no general disposition in the North to interfere with the rights of property, as they exist in the South. But he differed altogether with the Senator as to the course which these petitions ought to take. He differed with him entirely as to the effect produced upon the public mind by the discussion, or by the agitation, in any form, of this question here. Nothing, in his judgment, tended more to alarm the fears, and to disturb the tranquillity of the slaveholder, than debate upon these Abolition petitions in either branch of Congress.

Nothing, in his judgment, tended more to give encouragement, and to inspire confidence among the leading Northern Abolitionists themselves, than a discussion upon their memorials. And he, anxious for peace within our borders, lamented the debate which had recently taken place in the House of Representatives upon Abolition petitions.

The debate, in his judgment, was uncalled for, and ill-advised. It could do no good; it might produce great evil in the North, if not in the South. The resolutions offered at the last session in the House of Representatives, by his friend Mr,

ATHERTON, had been offered to quiet the public mind upon this distracting subject, to prevent excitement, and to show to the South that the Northern feeling was generally opposed to any action by Congress upon Abolition petitions. These resolutions, thus presented, and for such an object, designating merely the mode of disposing of this class of memorials, had met with the most determined opposition from every quarter. That opposition was not confined to the non-slaveholding States. They met with a most extraordinary opposition from another quarter. The author, in the North, had been vilified as the destroyer of the right of petition. He was charged at home, within the limits of his native State, with having, by a shameful dereliction of public duty, prostrated and rendered of no effect one of the dearest rights of the people. That charge he had met, fearlessly met, before his people; and that people had recently passed a commentary upon his course, most gratifying to his feelings. They had returned upon the issue a verdict with which he has every reason to be satisfied. Gentlemen from slaveholding States had denounced Mr. ATHERTON's resolutions as wholly inefficient, and destructive of Southern rights. The resolutions were presented for the purpose he had stated, and contemplated the adoption of a rule of practice in relation to this class of memorials, precisely similar in effect to that what has been in use in the Senate, and from which much benefit, in his judgment, had already resulted. Experience has shown that, so violent was the opposition to the resolutions, by some from the slaveholding States themselves, it was rendered altogether impracticable to re-enact them at the present session for the guidance of the House of Representatives. A month of angry and useless debate in that branch of Congress, gave distinct evidence that some thing must be done, and done without delay, to give tranquillity to the public mind. And what was to be done? Would it have answered further to delay, and put off action upon the all important public business before that branch of Congress—would it have answered longer to have consumed the public time, and to have exhausted the public Treasury, in offering and disposing of those memorials, asking for the abolition of slavery, as they might occasionally be presented? Was a course like this to be tolerated? Sure he was, that the response of his own State would most emphatically be, No! And for what object was opposition made to the adoption of any rule of practice which would, in effect, dispose of Abolition memorials, when offered without any debate or definite action. To save, it was said, the right of petition—to protect this high privilege of the citizen. He utterly denied that the general right of petition was impaired under the rule of practice, as adopted by both the House and the Senate at the last, or as established by the House at its present, session, in relation to the mode of disposing of Abolition memorials. That general right remains undisturbed, untouched, by this recent act of the House of Representatives. The ATHERTON resolutions and the recent rule have the same general object in view—to prevent debate—to save all action upon this particular class of petitions. It was not believed, or even supposed by any one, that under either rule the House would bestow the least consideration upon these petitions—they were to meet the same fate there, that they experienced here—they were in no sense to be received for any purpose of legislative action—they were, without reading, without printing, without referring, to receive their quietus; and, mystify this matter as you may, this was the sum and substance of the action of both Houses of Congress in relation to Abolition petitions. But in no way is the general right of petition thereby impaired, nor, in truth, is the particular right of petition upon the self same subjects, thereby infringed. Both the Senate and the House have distinctly indicated that they will not consider—that they will not act upon—these memorials; and this is all they say. They take away no right of petition—they do not thereby prevent the people from assembling and asking, at any time, for a redress of grievances. They distinctly say that, as far as it respects petitions asking for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, coming from persons without the District, they will not take them for legislative action. This is all; and had he, at the time, been a member of the House of Representatives, under existing circumstances, he should have voted as the majority of the delegation from his State voted upon the resolution offered to the House by the honorable member from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON.] He would have done this as the only course left him, in order to put to rest this agitating question; and, in doing thus, he could not have supposed for a single moment that he was thereby abridging the general right of petition. In his opinion, it was due to the interests of the public to put this question to rest—to stop debate, and to avoid action upon this subject. He, therefore, was free to say that he entirely approved the course which his friends in the other House had seen fit to take; and he entertained no doubt that their course would be approved by their constituency. His own course, since he had been a member of Congress, upon the subject of Abolition petitions, was well known at home, and well understood here. He had been in favor of that proposition which contemplated the least possible disturbance of this agitating subject. His language had been, "Hands off." Let this whole matter alone. No possible good could result: if, by entertaining the petitions of the Abolition memorialists—even if Congress should carry into effect the prayer of these memorialists, and slavery should be even abolished in the District of Columbia, there would not be one slave the less. His opinion had been, and still was, agitate not this question. Let this subject alone, had been his appeal at home, his doctrine here. It concerns not those who send up to the Senate, periodically, their petitions. If grievances exist, arising from the institutions of domestic slavery, they cannot effect those States in which no such institutions are established. If slavery be a great moral evil, let that evil be confined to the region where it is tolerated. If rights exist, growing out of the relation, he would not interfere therewith. In no sense, in his judgment, can the Abolitionists of the North be justified in their unhallowed efforts—efforts tending to destroy the rights of property, and tending to rend asunder this Confederacy. He would now say to the non-slaveholding communities—as he had repeatedly before said—let this whole matter alone.

And is he obnoxious, or are his particular friends in the House, who voted for Mr. JOHNSON's resolution, obnoxious to the charge of abridging the general right of petition by the course pursued? How has he, or how have they, impaired that right? No man is more in favor of the rights of the people than himself; and this right of petition, he believes, is one of their dearest rights. But how has he impaired that right? Does it follow because that he, in the exercise of a sound discretion, sees fit to withhold a petition sent him from his constituent, that he thereby abridges the right of that constituent? No: not in the least. The constituent has a clear, undisputed right to send his memorial here; but does it follow that the Representative is bound, at all hazards, to present it; or does it follow that the body to which it is addressed is bound, at all events, to receive it? Not so. The Representative and the body must act upon his and their responsibility. Would it be said that he was bound to present a petition, coming from his constituents, asking for the abolition of slavery in the State of Virginia?—a request undermining the foundations of this Government? Can it be contended that the Senate would be bound to receive such a petition? No. The Abolitionist himself would hardly contend for this. There is, then, of necessity, some limitation to this right of petition.

He would not deny to his constituent the existence of this right in its broadest sense; but the Representative has not only a duty to perform to his immediate constituents, but to the country. The petitioner may ask for that which it would be most dangerous to the peace and security of the Union to grant. Should a petition of this character be received and considered? The Representative, and the body to whom the memorial shall be addressed, must exercise their own discretion and judgment. If the doctrine be correct, as contended for by Senators upon the other side, the Senate is bound to receive every memorial, coming from whom it may, and asking for what it may; otherwise the right of petition is impaired. If the right of petition implies an absolute and unqualified obligation to receive, does it not follow, with equal force, that the right imposes a corresponding obligation to consider and to act?

If this general right of petition is thus abridged, then it follows that, at all events, and under any circumstances, Abolition petitions coming up here, and all others, must not only be received, but considered and acted upon by the body to which they may be addressed. The Legislature of his own State had, on frequent occasions, given such an expression of their own opinion as relieves him and his friends from all difficulty and embarrassmenton this question.

His own State had so repeatedly, through her Legislature, declared the palpable injustice of any action by Congress upon the subject of slavery, as it exists in this District, unrequested by its inhabitants, that he could not, nor could his friends in the other House, for a moment believe, that by his and their course upon the subject of Abolition petitions, he and they were depriving them of one of their dearest rights. How is this doctrine attempted to be supported? It is said that this sacred right of petition is expressly guarantied by the first article of amendments to the Constitution of the United States. In his judgment, that article has no particular bearing whatever upon the question. This right, as it now exists, so it has existed long before the Constitution itself was formed. What is the article to which reference has been made?

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or of the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

Now, he utterly denied, that by the course he had pursued here, or by the course his friends had pursued elsewhere, that he or they were lending their aid in the passage of any law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or to prevent the people peaceably assembling together to ask the Government for a redress of grievances. He would go as far as he who would go farthest against the passage of all such laws. He was utterly and absolutely opposed to any such legislation. How, then, has he, or how have his friends in the other House, by his and their course of conduct upon these memorials, exposed themselves to the charge of impairing the general right of petition?—a right well understood by his people, and a right which he would not disturb or abridge—a right which, he rejoiced to add, was so universally enjoyed, and which could be so properly exercised by the freemen of this country.

Mr. PRESIDENT: I rise to participate in this debate, so far only as the question is supposed to involve the right of petition, and the policy of our action here, in reference to that view of the subject.

The honorable Senators, from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] and from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE,] seem to regard a refusal by Congress to the presentment of petitions for the abolition of slavery, as an infraction of that right, whilst the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has, with his accustomed eloquence, and much plausibility, expressed his apprehension that the people of the South, in claiming even their rights here with too fastidious exaction, may diminish their friends in the North, by permitting the Abolitionists the advantage of involving, with their primary question, the more popular one of the right of petition, and that many will probably make common cause on the right of petition, and persist in asserting that principle here, who would not concur in the particular proposition on which this right is so frequently debated.

I propose a brief discussion of these two questions; and first, as to the right of petition.

The following is the amendatory article of the Constitution of the United States, in which the right is said to be secured:

"ART. 1. Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

In respect to the right of petition, what does this article propose? It does not attempt to specify the measure, or the extent of the right, or to what subjects it shall appertain. It does not attempt to specify what are the duties and obligations of Congress in the reception of petitions, or the measure of redress which Congress may, can, or shall afford. The right secured by this article is simply an immunity on the part of the people from any law emanating from Congress abridging the popular rights "peaceably to assemble and petition Government for redress of grievances." Whilst Congress abstains from making any such prohibitory law, are not all the obligations which this article imposes upon Congress duly respected? It must be observed that this article contains no grant of power to Congress; it does not enlarge the sphere of its duties—it brings nothing within the jurisdiction of Congress not otherwise conferred by the Constitution; it does not multiply the subjects on whtch it is permitted to give audience, indulge debate, or grant relief. No such thing. It is prohibitory and restrictive on Congress, so far as power and jurisdiction are concerned. It observes entire silence as to the several subjects on which the people may rightfully and appropriately petition the "Government" of the United States for relief. These unquestionably must remain precisely as if this prohibitory article on the powers of Congress had never been inserted in the Constitution. What criterion, then, is furnished to the people for the appropriate exercise of their right of petition? Is not the answer obviously found in the inquiry as to what Government has the power to grant redress?

Suppose the grievance complained of be the statute of Massachusetts recently known as the "fifteen gallon law." Will any constitutional lawyer contend, or does the most ignorant citizen believe, that the article of the United States Constitution above quoted has conferred a right on the citizen to come here by petition to have that law abolished? The answer to such a proposition would seem to me so manifest as to leave no room for doubt on the subject. If such petition were presented, what should be not only the right of Congress, but its respectful duty toward a sovereign State? Should we permit ourselves to receive, refer, report, and debate the propriety of our assuming to correct the legislation of Massachusetts on this subject? May some half dozen citizens of Massachusetts come here and claim, as of right, to hold the sovereignty of that State in abeyance before Congress for weeks, and months, and years together, on such a subject, which every citizen feels and knows we have no jurisdiction of? But if the proposition appears unreasonable in this aspect, how much greater its enormity, when the measure, instead of being proposed by citizens of Massachusetts, protesting against the grievances of their own State laws, it should turn out that this mal-administration of affairs there was sought to be corrected in Congress, on the petition of some score of bacchanalians from the shore of the Mississippi?

As I would act, and as I believe the Senate would act in such a case, so, in my judgment, they ought to act in this.

This, Mr. President, is emphatically a question of jurisdiction, and the rejection of such petition as now presented does not assail or invade the right of petition. The whole scope and extent of the political RIGHT of petition, is the right to ask redress from that Government or tribunal having the power to grant relief.

Common sense, as well as legal and constitutional rules, prescribe this as an essential principle, and necessary limitation to the right of petition. If a citizen of the United States was desirous to obtain a patent right of protection to a mechanic invention, to be used in the kingdom of Great Britain, would he, as a matter of common sense and propriety, petition that Government or this for the protection? If a citizen of the United States, of the Catholic faith, desired some spiritual indulgence from the church, would he petition the papal power of Rome, or this Federal Government? If it were desired by the citizens of New York to have some new regulation in respect to their public markets—or on the subject of lamp-lighting the streets of that city—is there any among them who, through ignorance, or in pretending to assert the right of petition, would come here for redress of such grievances? Do any citizens of our country, seeking to recover debts owing to them by other citizens, ever assert their right of petition so unadvisedly as to ask the judgment of Congress to award that redress? All must accord a negative response to these propositons, and the reason must as obviously occur to all: namely, in seeking either favor or redress, the petitioner perceives and acts upon the necessity to present his solicitations where the power is vested to grant what is asked for.

I readily admit, that in a complex system of Government, there may be evils, for the redress of which intelligent citizens might mistake the tribunal or authority to which they should apply. Nay, further, that the departments or tribunals themselves might honestly mistake their own power, and wrongfully grant or withhold relief. But the difficulty of distinguishing the appropriate tribunal, having power to grant relief, does not change the principles of the question. And this rule is particularly true of the Government of the United States, which is of limited jurisdiction. It is not for the Goverment to palter with pretensions to jurisdiction, when it is ascertained not to be within its granted powers. There should be no affected courtesy to those who would besiege this Senate into the assertion of unauthorized power, at the expense of prostrating the sovereignties who send us here—and particularly on a question, the right to legislate on which has been so often disclaimed on all sides, and in which opinion all here concur.

But further, to illustrate this question of jurisdiction in contradistinction to the right of petition, it may be observed that all our citizens practically understand the duplicate form of their Government, and readily distinguish the general and exclusive powers that appertain to their State Government from those which belong to the United States Government. Every citizen knows that the great body of the laws that prescribe his rights and duties as a member of society, and the rules and regulations that control his right and title to property, emanate from his own State Legislature; and it seldom occurs (and perhaps has never occurred) that a petition is presented here which so mistakes its proper direction as to ask relief of this Government in matters respecting which the petitioner's State Government alone possessed the power to grant relief. And it is perhaps still more remarkable that neither ignorance or impertinence has ever perpetrated a petition by citizens of a State to their own State Legislature, asking the abolition of any law or institution in another State. Every citizen of the slaveholding States, if inquired of why slavery does not exist in Massachusetts, will answer, because it is proscribed or abolished by the Government and laws of that State. And every citizen of the non-slaveholding States, if inquired of why slavery does exist in Mississippi, will as readily answer, the institution is established and permitted by the Government of Mississippi. Up to this point, and to this extent, all must understand the matter alike. Now, suppose the citizens of the South should commence, by petitions, to importune Congress to establish slavery throughout the States of New England. Has New England a Senator here whose constituents could be induced to believe Congress had the power to grant such petitions? And has New England a Senator here, or citizen at home, who would not feel himself insulted, and the rights and sovereignty of his State wantonly outraged, by incessant importunities here of this character? Would they defend the monstrous presumption of such importunities, and demand your respectful deference to their claims, on the ground that such was the right of petition? If such be the right, let us note its bearings in a case which might aptly arise on the same article of the Constitution, from which, it is said, this extent of the right of petition is deduced.

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion," &c. A petition is presented by the Baptist association of North Carolina, praying Congress to establish their creed and faith as the national religion, and abolish all others. A Senator having such petition in charge, states its import, and proposes its presentment. Its reception is objected to, because it seeks of Congress that which the Constitution forbids Congress to grant or to legislate upon. But the advocates of this extended right of petition, rise and answer: "We admit Congress has no power to grant the prayer of the petition, or to make any law respecting it. But the same article of the Constitution prescribes also that Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the * * right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances;' and we consider, first, the petitioners have a right to regard the provisions of the Constitution, interdicting Congress the power to establish national religion, as a 'grievance;' secondly, we are bound to listen to it, as a grievance rightfully complained of, though we are sworn to maintain it, as not a grievance; thirdly, we are bound to proceed with the preliminary formr of legislation, as if to grant redress, though we all know and acknowledge our oaths to support the Constitution as no 'grievance' in this behalf, compels us to deny redress. We therefore cannot constitutionally reject this petition, till all this solemn mockery is gone through with, in order to preserve the right of petition. The right to have these ceremonial preliminaries of legislation dispensed to the petitioners is secured to them as the vital principle of the right of petition. The petitioners knew, before coming here, the Constitution denied us the power to grant the 'redress' sought. It is presumed, therefore, they petitioned with no expectation of redress. And we are bound to conclude, that knowing their rights, and our power in this respect, they are merely asserting the right of petition, by way of a healthful political exercise. Thus we regard this sacred right. A right in this case, secured by the Constitution, to seek its destruction. A right which binds us as priests to minister at the sacrificial alter, though pre-obliged to save the victim. Finally, a right in this, and like cases without remedy, but yet a profound and sacred right."

Now, I ask of those who reason thus here, if they have heard the like logic at home from any of their constituents? I apprehend not. If their constituents fully understand this point in difference, if they will comprehend this essential nothing so far as their object is concerned in the particular case, and the right of petition is vindicated for them by their representatives here, will they importune us longer to gain this certain negative, this affirmative nothing? I state the question, and I state it for the common sense of the people to decide, and believe those that are honest will decide with us. It is this:

A petition is presented here to abolish slavery in the Southern States. Such petition, all parties, or a great majority, in Congress, agree, would seek that which Congress has no power to grant. It is no question of expediency or propriety; but it is a question of power—of jurisdiction—and the majority so believe and regard it. The question is then made, "Shall the petition be received?" Now if Congress be already agreed that they have no constitutional power to grant the petition, in what respect are the petitioners benefited in having it received? Suppose it be received and referred to a committee, who report thereon, "that Congress have no power over the subject-matter of the petition," and which report is adopted by the Senate, can the most sanguine petitioner imagine that he has asserted his rights with any more success than if his petition had been rejected without such reference and report? Has he obtained any more of what he sought in this latter result than the substantial rejection of his petition? Those who advocate the extended right of petition, say this mode of rejection is what the petitioners are entitled to. It is what they mainly desire—what they deem all important to the preservation of their liberties. As one, Mr. President, I do not believe the Abolitionists who understand the question as thus presented, are contending for any such phantom. Nor can they believe the essential right of petition consists in having their petition peremptorily denied by Congress for want of jurisdiction after report by a committee, rather than denied on presentment for the same reason. I have debated a case, Mr. President, in which all concur that Congress has no power to grant the petitioner's prayer, because the advocates of this extended interpretation of the right of petition assume that such peculiarity of the case makes no difference in their view of the question.

But in my judgment the whole class of petitions on this subject, whether to abolish slavery in this District, the Territories, or the States, are equally objectionable on constitutional grounds, though, perhaps, for somewhat different reasons.

Property, with the rights and incidents pertaining to it, originates in the arbitrary institutions of society. Land is generally a subject of property; water is seldom made so, and air never. Domestic animals are property; wild beasts and birds are not so regarded. Governments are instituted for the protection and regulation of life, liberty, and property. How far life or liberty shall be protected, is a stipulation in the compact of Government, indicated by consideration of the benefits and necessities of the social system. No society ever established a Government protecting life or liberty in their utmost possible extent. Nor was a Government ever established extending equality of rights, social or political, to all its members. The whole system of the domestic relations, of bond service by indenture or other means; the political disfranchisement of women, generally better, and often more capacitated, than the master man, who control them, are abiding illustrations of this latter position.

In the regulation of property, all Governments resting in compact have some limits prescribed to them. There is not, and probably there never was, a Government beneath the sun, possessed of the right, as a conceded and acknowledged prerogative, to take or abolish the property of the citizen or subject at pleasure, and without recompense. Such a compact would be a political absurdity, inasmuch as it implies a principle destructive of a primary end and object for which Government is instituted.

In our General Government, and in many of our State Governments, of written and fundamental constitutions of political power, such an idea is expressly repudiated. I do not, of course, gainsay the operation of the penal and taxing powers of the Government, by which rights to property are seized up, lost, or forfeited, though these also are restrained. But I speak of the assertion, by Government, of a distinct, independent power, which, from considerations of general or particular benefit to the social system, it should assume to take from the citizen, without recompense, that which his form of Government had entitled him to possess as property; or to abolish, by legislation, any species of property held by the citizen, and so to cancel all right and title of the proprietor. I believe there is not a single State Government in the Union invested with the power to pass such a law. The people, in organizing their form of Government, may undoubtedly invest their Legislature with such a power. But I repeat my belief, there is no evidence extant that they ever have yet committed so gross a folly. If, by mere legislation, any of our Governments, from motives of municipal policy, can destroy and abolish the property of the citizen, then can they also legislate away the lives or liberties of the citizen. Life, liberty, and property, as regarded in our Government, constitute the political trinity in the faith of the American citizen. In their conservative destiny, they are one and indivisible.

To regulate the use of property, great and ample powers are conferred upon the Legislature. For such conservative purposes it is but little restricted. A man's house may be demolished to save a city from conflagration. His private property may be destroyed to prevent its giving succor to a hostile army. He may be forbidden to wear concealed weapons, or to permit his ox or dog to roam at large on the public highway. But suppose the Legislature pass a law that all the cattle and horses owned by the citizens shall cease to be property, the right of ownership therein abolished, and the animals turned out to the enjoyment of brute freedom; would such a law be valid? I answer, without hesitation, it would not.

Now the rule in regard to the power of the Legislature will be the same, whether it attempts to abolish the citizen's right of property in lands, houses, furniture, or slaves. There is no power in the Legislature to abolish either. Were such a law enacted, the people, by common consent, might defer to its provisions, and forbear to contest its validity. But I advance the opinion, with much confidence, that if such a law be ever passed, under existing powers of Government, and its validity shall be contested by the citizen, the Judiciary will pronounce it void.

Then, how stands the case with this District? The Constitution has invested Congress with the power of "exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District."

Now what may Congress do? They may "legislate in all cases," but can they do what they please in all cases, without restraint? Can Congress, for the capricious reasons of social propriety, take away by law the lands or goods of the citizen, or abolish his right of property in either? Can Congress, from considerations of promoting public or retributive justice, require by law that the owners of slaves shall exchange their relative condition, and the servant, in turn, become the master? I conclude all will admit Congress possesses no such powers as the questions contemplate.

It is readily perceived, then, that the power given to Congress, to "legislate in all cases whatsoever over such District," will not authorize it to do all things by its legislation. There are, perhaps, few Abolitionists so perfectly frantic on this subject, as to contend that the exclusive legislative powers of Congress here would authorize the passage of a law to sell the District out at auction. All will perceive the genius and spirit of our Government impose some limitation to its powers. We then arrive at the important question, can Congress abolish slavery in this District, and deprive the citizen of his right and property therein, without compensation.

To solve this question, I consider the Constitution itself a sufficient and affirmative exposition.

Article five of the amendments prescribes that "no person shall be * * * deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation."

By the first part of this article life, liberty, and property, are secured to the citizen on the same terms; and, by the same means appointed to deprive him of either, he may be deprived of all. The second part is equally explicit and easy of comprehension; and both remarkable for the prompt morality they inculcate.

The Government, as representing the public in its authority of eminent domain, may take private property for public use, by rendering just compensation. But the Congress of the United States, in all its omnipotence of power, cannot, by the enactment of a direct law for that purpose, and without pretence of its being for the public use, as authorized by the Constitution, deprive the citizen of either State or District of his property, or right of property, to the value of a shilling; and I will add, also, it would be the highest prerogative of despotism, were it otherwise.

As to the powers of the General Government to regulate the use of property in this District, I readily acknowledge it is possessed in the most ample extent. But its exercise would be an irresponsible and odious tyranny, if instigated and prescribed by foreign influence, and enforced by mere power on the people of the District, against their will.

With these views, I maintain that the want of jurisdiction, the absence of adequate power to grant a petition to abolish slavery in this District, exhibits our rights and duties to be no more or less than pertains to us on petitions to abolish slavery in the States.

I have no object or intention to derogate from the right of petition, and would not, here or elsewhere, abridge that right in a single hair's breadth, in its legitimate exercise. It furnishes a convenient means to the minority, essentially useful and proper, by which to urge their complaints, and ask redress of such grievances as the measures of the majority may inflict upon them. But I contend the right of petition can never confer upon us any dominion whatever over subjects not delegated in the Constitution. It cannot require of us, whose powers and duties are circumscribed and appointed by the Constitution, that we shall be invoked, or rather goaded to action, and required to attempt, and partially progress, to do that which we are forbidden to do, in order to vindicate an exaggerated extension of a right, perverted into wrong, insult, and aggression.

It is not to be questioned but the right of petition is convenient in its appropriate functions, and valuable in its degree; and, in my apprehension, it is no depreciation of that right to say, that so far as indicated in the Constitution of the United States, it does not challenge the extravagant eulogies bestowed upon it here. The right, as there incorporated, breathes a distrust which might not be improperly entertained against a despotism, but certainly does not evince the highest pretensions of a free people, who claim the right to make and unmake their form of government at pleasure.

Few, I presume, would distinguish it as the most favorite feature in the Constitution of a free, wise, and just Government of the people's choice. It might be regarded as a trophy of some pride and boast where an oppressed people had wrested it from the strong grasp of the tyrant. It was well spoken by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that the ballot box, which, in our Democratic system of Government, commands the will of the majority to be executed in all our legislation, (within the rules prescribed by the organic law,) is a main substitute for the right of petition in arbitrary Governments; and I will add, of much higher and prouder pretensions. In our system the right of petition is the most limited of popular and political rights.

The specification of such a right, in our power of Government, implies in one view an apprehension of wrong to the citizen, superinducing a necessity to sue for as a favor, that which the people in this Government may demand as a right. In the other aspect it implies the still humbler privilege of soliciting that which it may be generous to bestow, and yet not unjust to withhold.

If our Government was that of the few, which oppressed the many, and when the people assembled to petition for redress of grievances, the minions of power, backed by the military, read the riot act, or the tyrant's proclamation, and then dispersed the multitude, under such circumstances it might be highly prized as a great and gracious privilege to approach the throne of a master through the obsequious medium of petition. But I trust it shall prove a vain effort of the Abolitionists to magnify the right of petition here, into such consecrated importance as to profit them much in aid of their seditious cause. They cannot dignify this right by claiming for it such profound consideration, but at the correspondent expense of debasing the American people to a more servile condition than every principle of their Government entitles them to occupy. To hold it up here as a test of the people's freedom, the conservative principle of their liberties, the deep foundation on which their Government rests, and that all is at stake in the rejection of their petitions, is truly working up an ocean tempest

* * * "to drown a fly."

The condition of the American people is happily more elevated, their means of political preservation more enlarged, than this portentous clamor would report them. It is a false alarm, and will not take, that the liberties of the people are held by so frail a tenure as the right of petition.

But I am not tenacious that such petitions as now presented should be refused admission, rather than nailed to your table, so soon as received upon it. As a question of right, I would certainly prefer that such petitions should not be received into this chamber at all. I would prefer it, also, from a sense of due and becoming respect to those States whose sovereignties and reserved rights these petitions most wrongfully and rudely assail.

With respect to the propriety and policy of referring these petitions, and reporting on their merits, with the view of conciliating the petitioners, I shall say but little more than to declare my uncompromising aversion to such a course. Not that I should apprehend, from the present organization of the Senate, a report tending, in any material degree, to excite apprehensions, or endanger our rights in the South. I am well assured no such report would at this time be made. But it is sufficient for me to repeat, that as I verily believe Congress has no rightful jurisdiction of the subject, I should regard any report that could be made as a triumph yielded to the officious importunities of the petitioners, and hence a criminal usurpation of power against the sovereignty of the States interested. Nor do I believe that any report which would be made here, would allay that obtrusive spirit of the petitioners. It is the Moloch spirit of religious and political fanaticism; and when has sober reason and simple justice ever met such adversaries with success?

To the honest and misguided of our Northern brethren who may have conceived their right of petition at hazard in this contest, we will say to them, in hope and confidence, that their full and impartial investigation of this question must result in our justification. The question of jurisdiction, in every tribunal on earth, is a previous question, rightfully made at the threshold; and no court, that maintains a decent respect for its own character and the rights of suitors, will betray itself by a judgment on the merits of the controversy, when not possessed of competent jurisdiction over the subject and the parties. Now the right of legal redress for injuries to person and property, and the pledge of power that the courts shall be kept open for the administration of such redress to all, are familiar pledges in most of the Constitutions of the State Governments. Suppose the citizen mistakes his forum, and seeks redress in one court, that can only be awarded to him in another: the court object to adjudge the merits of his case, because impotent to grant redress. But the suitor persists that his right of suit is guarantied to him by the Constitution, and that this right is arbitrarily nullified and rendered valueless, unless he can obtain a hearing and judgment on the merits of his cause. The answer which the court must necessarily give to such importunity is: "Your right of suit, as abstract from our duties to adjudge, we do not contest; but such right on your part does not confer on us a jurisdiction to decide your case. We take no cognizance of the matter, not from disrespect to the suitor, but for want of proper authority to retain and adjudge the suit. Go hence, to that tribunal which has the power to grant what you petition for."

So would reason, necessity, and the philosophy of its principles, dispose of such a question.

Those who seek only in sincerity to vindicate the right of petition in this controversy, I permit myself to indulge the belief, will concur in these common sense views of the subject. But to those who have determined to busy themselves with that which concerns them not, and who discard the dictates of common sense, the evidence of truth, and the lights of reason, to grasp at conclusions in a sheer spirit of wilfulness; those who reject facts to theorize in abstractions, who substitute the bigot's morality for municipal law; who trample, without show of decency or remorse, upon all the plighted faith and sacred compacts of our Union, and shout in justification the hypocritical pretext of the right of petition, to such we know our rights and reasoning are urged alike in vain. No conciliation can be hoped for with them, but on terms of concession that can never be submitted to, till that despotic usurpation which has unfurled its banner here in these petitions, shall extort them at Philippi.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the motion to receive the petition was laid on the table.

Mr. C. also presented a memorial of Kirk Brown, and others, praying for the imposition of a duty on silks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, February 13, 1840.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, a communication from Samuel Hazard, enclosing a copy of th Commercial and Statistical Register of the United States, was referred to the Committee on the Library.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the motion of Mr. CASEY to refer the memorial of the National Road Convention, held at Terre Haute, Indiana, to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill appropriating $150,000 to each of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to be expended on the Cumberland road.

Mr. RUSSELL remarked that it was known to the House that the committees had not been afforded an opportunity, at the present session, to make reports. He hoped the House would therefore agree to a suspension of the rules, for the purpose indicated; and, with the consent of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] he made the motion that the rules be suspended to enable him to introduce a proposition to receive reports from the committees, on to-morrow, till the hour of one o'clock.

Mr. PICKENS had no objection to yield the floor for the purpose.

Mr. RUSSELL'S motions—to suspend the rules, and to set apart one hour on to-morrow for the reception of reports—were then agreed to.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON suggested to the House the propriety of referring the many bills on the SPEAKER'S table to the various committees; but, objection was made.

Mr. DROMGOOLE begged the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] to yield the floor to him to make a motion to refer the President's annual message to the Committe of the Whole. It struck him that there was great impropriety in referring particular documents, accompanying the message, to the committees, and not to refer the message itself. He thought it was due to the character of the members, and due to the country, that it should be taken from the table and referred, that the House might, when it thought proper, go into committee on it.

Mr. PICKENS was willing to yield the floor; but objection was made to the motion, and it was not pressed.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi, by permission, gave notice that he would on to-morrow ask leave to introduce bills of the following titles:

A bill to regulate the fees of the clerks and marshals in the District Court of the Southern District of Mississippi; and

A bill further to provide for the adjustment of the claims to reservations of land under the fourteenth article of the Choctaw treaty, made at Dancing Rabbit Creek, in the year 1830.

Mr. PICKENS then proceeded to discuss the question before the House. He made a strong argument against the expediency and constitutionality of appropriating moneys from the National Treasury to objects of internal improvements in the States. He replied to the arguments of Mr. MASON of Ohio, and Mr. HOWARD of Indiana, that the National Government was bound by contract to complete the Cumberland road, and contended that the compact had been complied with to its fullest extent, and showed to the House that several millions more had been appropriated to that object than the means which formed the basis of the contract justified.

Mr. P. after concluding his remarks on the proposition before the House, which he opposed as being unprecedented and unparliamentary, and because it was improper to bind the committee to do a certain thing without allowing them the privilege of examining into its expediency and propriety, moved the following amendment as a substitute for it:

"And that the memorial be committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to consider the expediency of reporting a bill in favor of the measure."

Mr. PROFFIT then obtained the floor, not with a view, he said, of discussing the merits of the Cumberland road, but to hold up the present Administration to the censure of the people. He was in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CASEY,] and opposed to the substitute of Mr. PICKENS, because, he said, it evaded the question; and if referred to the committee in that form, it would never be reported upon. He had understood already that the Committee of Ways and Means would not report a bill without having before it estimates. He justified the committee in that course on the ground that they were bound to consult the report of the proper Department. He censured the Department of the Treasury for omitting the Cumberland road in the estimates, and contended that it was done intentionally. Mr. P. then denounced all the land schemes, or propositions to graduate and reduce the prices of land, as humbugs to deceive the people in the West; and commented on the message of the President recommending a reduction as a part of the same system of deception; and said he had heard, at every cross road in Indiana, the same arguments preached nine hundred and ninety-nine times over a barrel of hard cider. Mr. P. then censured and denounced the Administration for the manner in which the Florida war had been conducted, and made some humorous remarks in characterizing the officers which had returned from that war, as dandies. He then entered at large into a discussion of the State politics of Indiana, in the course of which he alluded to his colleague, [Mr. WICK,] and charged him with having denounced the Whigs as Federalists, a party to which that gentleman, he said, had but recently belonged; having been one of the electors for President in favor of Mr. CLAY, and having always acted with the Whigs.

Mr. WICK denied that he had ever been a Whig since the Federal party had assumed that cognomen. He was understood to say that he had never acted with this new-born Whig party, which was now made up with the fag ends of all parties and all principles. He was born and reared a Democrat, and had always followed in the footsteps of those who had acted upon the great principles upon which that party are united. It was true he had been an elector in favor of Mr. CLAY; but since that time that gentleman had repudiated his old Democratic principles, and a melancholy change had been effected in his opinions. He was, however, conscious (even if he was in the wrong) that he was now right, and that he should remain so.

Mr. PROFFIT then resumed his remarks, and continued in the same strain of denunciation. He then examined into the claims of General Harrison for the Presidency; and having eulogized his military exploits at Tippecanoe, the Thames, Fort Meigs, and the river Raisin, he concluded by saying that his advancement to the Presidential chair could not add one laurel to his brow, but might do him an act of justice.

Mr. MARVIN rose, not for the purpose of making a speech, but to offer a substitute for that of Mr. PICKENS, and as an amendment for the original proposition. His amendment contemplated that the Committee of Ways and Means should discharge a duty which it had done at every previous session of Congress. Until the last session, it had been in the habit of reporting bills for the Cumberland road, and for constructing harbors and building light-houses; but it had refused at that time to take the responsibility; and if it be left to them at this time, as a mere question of expediency or propriety, the House would never hear of the matter again. The committee was so constructed, that it would control the subject, and entirely keep it from before the House. He was not to be alarmed by the assertion that it was not in accordance with parliamentary practice to bind a committee of the House to carry out its views. If the House was in favor of any particular measure, it was right and proper to instruct or compel its committees to report such a bill as would best promote its wishes. But he contended that the committee had just as much jurisdiction over this subject now as it had at any past time—that it had the estimates of the Topographical bureau, which had been referred to it, and ought to be compelled, by instruction, to act upon those estimates. He believed it more than idle to pass upon any proposition simply to ask the committee to inquire into the propriety of reporting an appropriation for this road. Mr. M. after arguing for some time in reply to Mr PICKENS, contended that it was perfectly constitutional for the General Government to carry on works of internal improvement and to construct harbors on the lakes, and concluded by offering his proposition as follows, as an amendment to the original proposition:

"And that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report bills in accordance with the estimates contained in the reports from the Chief Engineer and the Chief of the Topographical Engineers, to the Secretary of War, and communicated to Congress by the President, making appropriations for the year 1840, for the continuation of the construction or improvements of harbors and roads, and the navigation of rivers, for which appropriations have been heretofore made."

Mr. BARNARD then obtained the floor, and proposed the following, which he prevailed on the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARVIN] to accept as a modification of his amendment, to follow at the end of the same, viz:

"Unless, in any particular case, the committee should be of opinion that the particular work ought to be entirely discontinued; and in such case, if any, the committee shall submit to this House the reason which lead to such conclusions.

Mr. B. was anxious to speak on the subject, and moved the House would adjourn; but withdrew it at the suggestion of Mr. BLACK, from the Select Committee on Printing, who reported a resolution to extend the time to that committee to investigate the subject, and to prepare its report.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS inquired why the committee did not fix a day on which to report.

Mr. BLACK said the time had now expired on which the committee was to have made a report; and it was impossible to fix a day, as it had much business yet to attend to.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS then proposed to amend the resolution by inserting the 1st of March; and, after some conversation between Messrs. BELL, BLACK, and R. GARLAND, as to how far the extension of time would affect the conditional contract with the Printer, the amendment was adopted, and the resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. HAND then presented several petitions, which were referred; after which,

On Motion of Mr. BARNARD,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, February 14, 1840.

Mr. PIERCE presented the memorial of Samuel E. Cones, and one hundred and fifty-nine other citizens of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, upon the subject of a Congress of Nations. Mr. P. said that most of the signers were known to him, either personally or by reputation. They were engaged in the various pursuits of life, and it was but just to say of them, that they were gentlemen of great intelligence, respectability, and high moral worth. They introduce the subject (which is treated with clearness and ability) by the declaration that "it is a growing sentiment among men, of all classes and professions, that international war is as needless as it is confessed to be ruinous to the resources and morals of a people;" and as "the most fruitful causes of war (in their estimation) flow from the unsettled state of international law," they present the project of a Congress of Nations, with a view to the double object of the amicable adjustment of national disputes, and the more definite one of the establishment of a code of international law. Although Mr. P. did not concur in all the views expressed by the memorialists, he entertained for their opinions a high respect, and moved the printing of the memorial, and its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented fourteen memorials from citizens of the United States, severally remonstrating against the use of bloodhounds in prosecuting the war against the Seminole Indians; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WALKER presented the petition of Edward C. Hyde, praying to be allowed to enter a quantity of land at the minimum price, in lieu of a like quantity purchased and paid for by him, and afterwards sold by the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. WRIGHT presented three memorials from citizens of the State of New York, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a petition of a number of citizens of Philadelphia county, praying a repeal of all laws that conflict with the Constitution of the United States; the motion to receive which was,

On motion of Mr. FULTON, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. B. also presented the petition of a number of citizens of Pennsylvania, relative to the abolition of the foreign slave trade; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he rose to present a petition signed by six hundred and twenty-seven citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, "manufacturers of, and employed in the manufacture of, umbrellas and parasols."

These petitioners state that, under the twenty-first clause of the second section of the tariff act of July, 1832, a duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem was imposed on the importation of "umbrellas and parasols, of whatever materials made." That this duty continued to be collected from the time that act went into operation, until the month of March last; when, under a new construction of the compromise act of March, 1833, silk umbrellas and parasols have been admitted free from any duty whatever.

The memorialists, therefore, ask Congress to pass an explanatory act imposing the same duties on silk umbrellas and parasols which were paid, under the acts of July, 1832, and March, 1833, until the month of March, 1839. They conclude by declaring that upon the action of Congress "depends the support of the many thousands who are engaged in the hitherto growing branch of domestic industry, which has amounted to millions of dollars per annum, but if admitted free from duty, umbrellas and parasols must cease to be of American manufacture."

Mr. B. said that if the Senate were a proper forum in which to debate or decide judicial questions arising under our own laws, he thought he could convince the body that the first construction of the compromise act, which had prevailed for six years, was correct, and that the late construction was not warranted by the spirit of that law.

In what condition had this recent construction placed our umbrella manufacturers? All the articles entering into the manufacture of umbrellas, such as whalebone, brass, and iron, now paid a considerable duty. To the extent of this duty, the foreign manufacturer enjoyed a premium over the domestic manufacturer; because the umbrellas of the former were imported altogether free of duty. He did not believe that any Senator who voted for the compromise bill, would say that he intended this act should receive any such construction, or produce any such effect.

Mr. B. trusted that the Committee on Finance would determine that a revenue duty of twenty per cent. should be imposed on the importation of foreign silks, and this would relieve the petitioners. Or, if this should not be the case, that they would report an explanatory bill, placing the umbrella manufacturers in the same position they had occupied for the six years previous to March, 1839.

The memorials were then referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed, with the accompanying document from Samuel Wright and William A. Drown, the Committee of Umbrella Manufacturers.

Mr. YOUNG presented a report, addressed to the Right Hon. Charles Poulett Thompson, President of the Board of Trade in Great Britain, on the subject of an inquiry into the number of accidents on board of vessels propelled by steam, the causes leading to such accidents, and the best mode of prevention; containing much valuable information, drawn from the experience of that country, as well as the countries of France, Belgium, and Holland; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented the memorial of John Hancock and others, praying the increase of a duty on foreign silks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. S. also presented the memorial of a number of citizens of New Jersey, remonstrating against the use of bloodhounds in the Florida war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FULTON presented the memorial of a committee of the Polish exiles, praying the passage of an act to authorize the immediate occupation and settlement, on their part, of the lands heretofore appropriated by Congress for their use; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented the petition of J. B. Plauche, praying to be allowed to locate on any unappropriated public land in the State of Louisiana, the amount of a Spanish concession made to his father in the year 1789, but rejected by the commissioner of the land office west of Pearl river; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred certain documents connected with the salt duty, reported them back to the Senate, with a motion that they be printed.

On this motion a debate ensued, which took a wide and discursive range, in which Messrs. BENTON, TAPPAN, DAVIS, CLAY of Kentucky, PRESTON, ALLEN, WEBSTER, WRIGHT, and CALHOUN, participated; when, without taking a question,

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the Senate adjourned till Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPREESNTATIVES,

FRIDAY, February 14, 1840.

The SPEAKER announced that the first thing in order was the presentation of reports from the committees.

Mr. RIVES asked the consent of the House to permit him to offer a resolution to have all the papers and testimony now before the Committee of Elections in relation to the New Jersey disputed election, printed for the information of the House.

Mr. STANLY and others objected.

Mr. RIVES moved to suspend the rules for that purpose.

Mr. WISE begged his colleague [Mr. RIVES] not to press his motion at this time. His colleague [Mr. BOTTS,] who was on that committee, and who was now absent, (anticipating that such a motion could be made,) had requested him, if it were made, to endeavor to prevail upon the mover not to insist. He would oppose it if he were present.

Mr. RIVES was understood to say it would afford him pleasure to do so, but he could not consent, consistently with a sense of duty. The papers were voluminous, and if they were ordered to be printed now, it would afford members an opportunity to form correct views of the merits of the question, and enable them to vote understandingly when they were required to vote.

Mr. RANDOLPH inquired of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] if such a resolution had not been before the committee, and rejected by a majority of it.

Mr. RIVES said he believed such was the fact; and it was for that reason that he had brought the subject before the House.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved a call of the House; which was refused.

Mr. CAMPBELL (chairman of the Committee of Elections) said he was perfectly aware that there could be no debate on this question; but, from what he could see of the temper of the House, he presumed the rules would not be suspended, and therefore he would be much gratified if he could be permitted to make a few remarks. He knew that he could not do so without permission of the House.

Several members objecting to Mr. CAMPBELL'S proceeding, the question was taken, and resulted —yeas 85, nays 73, equivalent to a decision in the negative—it requiring a vote of two thirds to suspend the rules. The vote was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. J. Allen, Atherton, Banks, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, John Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Craig, Cross, Dana, John W. Davis, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, James Garland, Gerry, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hook, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, McClellan, Mallory, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Reynolds, Rives, Edward Rogers, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sweeny, Taylor, Philip F. Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, Watterson, Weller, Wick, and Henry Williams—85.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Barnard, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Curtis, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dillett, Edwards, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Habersham, Hall, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, Lawrence, Lincoln, Marvin, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Nisbet, Ogle, Palen, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Rhett, Ridgway, Russell, Sergeant, Simonton, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, John White, T. W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—73.

The SPEAKER then called for reports from committees; when

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee of Elections, (that committee being the first on the list,) reported a resolution empowering the committee to have all printing done which it deemed necessary to facilitate the business before it.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to amend the resolution, by authorizing the committee to print all the evidence they have collected. Mr. J. in submitting this motion, observed that he did not propose discussing the question involved, and for that reason, and to save the time of the House, he would call for the previous question.

Mr. CRABB hoped the gentleman from Tennessee would not do so much injustice to the committee as to persist in his motion. I demand, said he, that the committee be heard.

Mr. CAMPBELL appealed to the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw his motion for the previous question.

Mr. C. JOHNSON declined withdrawing his motion. He had purposely avoided discussion himself, believing it would be a useless consumption of time.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a call of the House; which was ordered—ayes 85, noes 58; and

The roll was called, resulting in 187 members answering to their names. After calling the absentees, and excusing such of them as were absent from unavoidable causes,

On motion, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with, and the doors were opened.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, Senate bill to amend the act to provide for taking the sixth census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, approved 3d March, 1839, was taken from the SPEAKER's table, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The SPEAKER announced that the order of the day was the motion of Mr. CASEY to refer the memorial of the National Road Convention, held at Terre Haute, Indiana, to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill appropriating $150,000 to each of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to be expended on the Cumberland road.

The substitute of Mr. PICKENS for said instructions, as follows:

"And that the memorial be committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to consider the expediency of reporting a bill in favor of the measure."

And Mr. MARVIN's amendment to the original proposition, and substitute for Mr. PICKENS's amendment, as follows:

"And that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report bills in accordance with the estimates contained in the reports from the Chief Engineer, and the Chief of the Topographical Engineers, to the Secretary of War, and communicated to Congress by the President, making appropriations for the year 1840, for the continuation of the construction or improvements of harbors and roads and the navigation of rivers, for which appropriations have been heretofore made.

Mr. REYNOLDS, by permission, wished to correct some of the remarks he made a few days ago on the question now before the House.

Mr. R. said: I am satisfied I misunderstood the statement of Mr. HUBBARD of Alabama, about granting to the State of Illinois the public lands to complete the Cumberland road. He stated he was willing, so far as he was concerned, that the States might tax the public lands in Illinois, Ohio, and Indiana, to make the road, provided they did not tax them higher than they would tax their own citizens for that purpose.

Mr. BARNARD said the proposition before the House was general, and embraced the whole system of internal improvements, which have been under the fostering care of the Government for many years. He was pleased that it had been made general. He had no disposition to connect this subject with party, but did not believe it was possible for him, more than others, to divorce it entirely from party. He hoped, however, whatever aspect it should assume with reference to party, it should be of a national and patriotic cast, and be not merged into local and personal party contest. The question was one of a great national party policy—it was whether it be not the duty of Government to provide, by all the means in its power, and that it commanded, for the construction and repair of roads, of national and military importance; for construction and improvement of harbors, and removal of obstructions from navigable rivers for the good of commerce. This was the great question involved; a question which had been identified with the politics of the country, necessarily, for many years. He believed it was of the utmost importance that the National Government should prosecute all works of the above character, commenced or partially completed. The system of internal improvements to which he had referred was one commenced long ago, and was prosecuted by the power and agency of the Government for a long series of years, and there was nothing new or unusual in it—it was one which had commanded the favor of every President of the United States, every Administration of Government, every party in power, and every party of any considerable standing which expected to get into power, since the system was first introduced. It had met, certainly, with personal and partial opposition; but he believed if there was any one system of policy which might be considered as established by the Government, it was this one. It was now, for the first time since it was introduced, suspended, now for the first time placed in jeopardy. That machinery of Government which had been employed for a series of years, has been now thrown out of gear. The system, so far as the President and cabinet were concerned, had been entirely abandoned. He then argued at some length, to show the correctness of the positions assumed above, and to show that the President had taken distinct grounds against it, but did not complain because he had exercised his constitutional prerogative in abandoning it. They were now told, said Mr. B. that the public lands and duties on imposts yields just so much revenue, and that there were certain indispensable objects, (as enumerated in the estimates,) which would consume the whole, and would leave nothing for objects of internal improvemen'; and, from the reading of the message, the idea of increasing the tariff is so entirely of the question, that it is not to be regarded for a moment as the ultimate source from which the great system could derive means for its support, and commented at some length on that part of the message which enjoins on Congress the propriety of keeping within the bounds of the estimates, to which he was understood to be opposed, and went on to show that, from his reading of the Constitution, Congress had the power to lay duties for the common defence and general welfare, without any other restriction, and claimed that the subject of discussion came within that provision, and should receive the fostering care of the Government.

Mr. B. then went into a lengthy examination of the compromise act, to show how far its provisions could be complied with, without abandoning the system of internal improvements by the General Government, and to what extent the duties could be increased under it to carry on that system. The President and Secretary had referred to that act as if it was impossible to revive the tariff, except in case of war; that he had adopted it as a basis for his estimates not only for the present, but for the future; and the consequence would be, if it was not to be touched, that the most invaluable policy and interests of the country would be sacrificed. It seemed to be looked upon by the father and framer of that law; as well as the Executive, as a sort of new Constitution; as a law superior to all other laws; yes, as one overriding even the Constitution. It was to be regarded by the Executive as limiting the Constitution, and even restricting the powers of that House; and what effect it would have upon the great manufacturing interests of the country remains to be settled. The National road, harbors, all the great objects of the past care of the Government, were to be sacrificed to the genius of the compromise act. Thus, sir, we have a new rule set up, by which the action of the Government should be measured. The question hereafter would be no longer what the interests ot the Government required, but whether the 20 per cent. ad valorem would admit of carrying out any measure that might be for its interest. A political alliance had been formed between the head of the present Administration and a distinguished individual, the great champion of this compromise act. The first effect of that alliance was the total abandonment of the system of internal improvements. He begged leave, for one, to enter his solemn dissent, and upon his official responsibility, to the whole doctrine which belonged to the assumption, on the part of the President of the United States, that this compromise could not be touched. He did not believe that it was superior to the Constitution, and could not be disturbed, though he was not, at present, willing that it should be disturbed.

But he protested that it should not be considered of any higher legal value than other laws, or that the action of the Government should be restricted to its provisions. He did not believe that the 20 per cent. ad valorem was to be a standard now, and for the future. He did not agree that the manufacturing interests and system of internal improvements should be sacrificed, because of the existence of this law; and there was no good reason why they should not resort to temporary loans to carry out the great intents of the Government if it was found necessary. Mr. B. contended that if the system shou'd be suspended, the greater part of the money already expended would be as completely lost as if it had been sunk in the ocean. A great enterprise was to be broken off, half executed; and the part of the road completed would be of no sort of value. Harbors half executed—wharves and dikes half built, were to fall a sacrifice in consequence of the new political alliance. For one, he objected. Mr. B. then spoke at some length, to show how injuriously the abandonment of the system would operate on the improvements on the Hudson river now partly completed; and said if the House would agree to appropriate to complete that work with the understanding that all other objects of internal improvement would be abandoned by the Government, he would, on behalf of his constituents, reject the proffer. He went for the whole system, which was a glorious one, and would never consent to abandon it to benefit a particular part of it. If it was to be abandoned on the score of economy, it was not such economy as was worthy of a statesman. He again contended that the twenty per cent. tariff rule was no rule for the proper action of the Government, and if any one branch of the public service was likely to suffer by it, it was the duty of the Government to raise means to prevent it.

Mr. B. then went on to argue that the proceeds of the public lands should be applied expressly to purposes of internal improvement. He regarded the public lands as being held by the Government in trust for the people of all the States, and did not recognise the right of the Government to apply its proceeds to the ordinary purposes of Government; but contended that the Government should pay such expenses by duties on imports; and if such expenses required that the duties should be increased, it ought to be done so in time of peace as well as in time of war. The moneys expended on objects of internal improvement, he thought, would be reimbursed to the Government, eventually, through the means of the general benefits which it would confer on the country in developing its resources. He then went on to examine the estimates, comparing those of the past year with those of the present, to prove that the great reduction contemplated in the expenses of Government by the President, was owing to the abandonment of objects of internal improvement and the diminished number of pensioners, and not by a retrenchment of unnecessary expenses, and thought the President did not deserve much credit for it.

Mr. B. argued in support of the proposition to instruct—he held it absolutely necessary in the present state of the case to instruct. The cabinet was a unit, and was opposed to the objects contemplated in the instruction; and the House knew how the Committee of Ways and Means was constructed with reference to it. They knew, from the symptoms which came from that committee last year, that it was opposed to it—and it was a premonitory symptom of what might be expected from it this year. Unless that committee was positively instructed, he did not believe it would report one single bill for objects of internal improvement. Under ordinary circumstances, he would not instruct that committee.

Mr. CRARY was aware that it had become a common custom to consider all the questions which come before the House with reference to constitutional considerations; but as far as the amendment to the amendment was concerned, he could hardly suppose that the strictest constructionist in the House doubted the power of Congress to act on it. It was not in the power of the States to impose taxes for the improvement of their harbors; and that power being exclusively confined to Congress, it became necessary for them to come here for appropriations, when such improvements were wanted. As Congress had taken the jurisdiction, it must therefore take the consequences resulting from it. He was aware that great abuses had existed under the system, but the existence of these abuses was no argument against the exercise of this power, when it became necessary. He was willing at any time to go into a correction of these abuses—to lop off extravagant and unnecessary expenditures; but at the same time he would vote the appropriations which the rich and increasing commerce of the Northwestern lakes demanded. The expenses for these harbors, Mr. C. said, had grown up under peculiar circumstances, well worthy the attention of the House. That section of country had, within a few years, undergone an almost entire revolution with regard to the prices of the products of industry. Hence it was estimated that, in 1830, a work that would cost one hundred thousand dollars, would cost double that amount in 1836. Added to this, the commerce of the lakes had increased to an unexampled degree. In 1834 there was but little commerce on them, but, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARVIN] told them yesterday, it now employed a tonnage equal to that of the Atlantic coast, exposed to greater dangers and consequently requiring a more efficient protection. The vessels fitted out from the Atlantic cities are not exposed to the dangers of the coast, as is the case with those navigating the lakes, but numbers of them make voyages in which they are absent from two to three years from home. On the contrary, the vessels on the lakes are continually exposed to danger, daily and hourly passing within its reach. It would be remembered that it was by the improvements of the harbors on the lakes, that the whole of the Northwestern domain had been brought into market, and a populous State raised up from a wilderness. When this system commenced, the State which he represented was almost entirely unknown—a country of sands and marshes; and he had no doubt that there were many gentlemen here who believed that all this country was a wild, barren and bleak waste, and unfit for cultivation and the support of man. Yet when they came to look into the history of the operations of this Government, it would be seen that a large portion of our revenues was derived from this very country. The State he represented had, in the last four years, brought into the Treasury something like eight millions of dollars. Now, Mr. C. argued that if these improvements had resulted so much to the benefit of the Government, it ought not to question the expediency of carrying them on. After having induced these people to go on and settle this wilderness, would the Government say to them that they shall have no avenue by which to send the products of their industry to market; that they shall be isolated and cut off from all the benefits of the Government, while compelled to bear a large portion of its burdens? Mr. C. then referred to a part of the argument of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] and expressed his pleasure at the expansive views of that gentleman with regard to the extension of this great empire by the addition of new States; and he hoped soon to have an opportunity of testing his professions. But the gentleman was mistaken in supposing that, if we had a war with Great Britain, the battles would be fought on the ocean, or that the Atlantic cities would be the only points attacked by the enemy. On the contrary, he said the battle would be fought on the lakes. There would be no invasion on the Atlantic border; but the enemy would pour his squadrons into Canada, and, from Canada, strike us in our weakest point. Mr. C. then took a view of the number of troops that the British Government had been concentrating for the last three or four years in Canada, and the pains that were taken by her experienced officers in drilling their militia. He spoke also of the fortifications which had been constructed by that Government, and the number of armed vessels they employed on the lakes, in contravention of their agreement with us, and said that all these circumstances showed that they were preparing themselves for a war with this country.

Mr. C. after an argument at some length to show the importance of an appropriation for these harbors, said he would make a brief reply to that part of the speech of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PROFFIT,] which was foreign to the subject under consideration, and therefore out of order. As the gentleman, however, had been permitted to take this latitude in debate, it was, in his opinion, perfectly in order to answer him. The gentleman had thought proper to bring into this discussion the military exploits of one of the candidates for the Presidency, [General Harrison,] whom he eulogized as the captain of all captains, while he gave him credit for military skill which did not, in his opinion, belong to him. He would not, Mr. C. said, trouble the House with one word on the subject, had it not been for the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana. When a gentleman came to make a speech calculated to convey an impression throughout the country which history did not warrant, he was justified in making a reply. The gentleman had based the fame of his great captain of all captains on three of his exploits—the battle of Tippecanoe, the victory of the Thames, and his being the author of the plan for the armament of the lakes. Now with regard to the battle of Tippecanoe, which laid the foundation of this great captain's fame in the estimation of the gentleman from Indiana, he had a few words to say. It would be impossible for the gentleman to point to any act of generalship in that battle. The order of battle was unskilful in the extreme. The army was encamped in the most vulnerable and exposed situation that could be selected, and at night was completely surprised by the savages, though every circumstance warned the General of his danger, and called on him for the utmost vigilance and circumspection. Though the number of the savages was but a little over four hundred, while the force of General Harrison amounted to 1,500 men; yet his army was only saved from total destruction by the gallantry of the Kentuckians, led by the gallant and ill-fated Daviess, and part of the brave Fourth regiment, which was composed of citizens of Massachusetts.

Mr. C. then took up the report of this battle, made by General Harrison to the War Department, commenting on its details in support of the position he had assumed, when

Mr. LINCOLN and several others called him to order, and Mr. L. appealed to the CHAIR whether it was in order for the gentleman to discuss matters not before the House. He insisted that the gentleman should take his seat, and not be permitted to proceed without the leave of the House.

Mr. OGLE hoped the gentleman might be permitted to proceed. He, as a friend of Gen. Harrison, was willing to hear all he had to say. Several other gentleman expressing the wish that the gentleman might be suffered to go on,

Mr. LINCOLN withdrew his objections.

Mr. CRARY, on resuming, observed that he had been well aware that he would not be permitted to reply to this part of the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana without interruption. But why was it, he asked, that that gentleman had been suffered to go on yesterday out of order, and to go so extensively into the history of a particular individual, while he was taken up almost in the beginning of a reply to him. If it was in order for a gentleman to depart from the question before the House, and discuss one part of the character of an individual, surely it ought to be in order to discuss another point of that individual's character in reply to it. But Mr. C. believed that all such discussions were wrong, and an unprofitable waste of the time of the House. He would not, on his part, have replied to this part of the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, had it not been necessary to correct erroneous impressions, which would be conveyed from this Hall. Mr. C. then continued his review of the report of the battle of Tippecanoe, and afterwards proceeded to notice the victory of the Thames, the whole credit of which, he showed, belonged to the present Vice President of the United States, at whose instance the plan of the battle first devised by General Harrison had been changed, and who led the Kentuckians, who fought the battle and gained the victory? Mr. C. then went on to show, from documentary history, that the plan for the armament of the lakes was not first suggested to the War Department by Gen. Harrison, but that the plan had been recommended a year previous, in a letter from Mr. Armstrong, afterwards Secretary of War, to the then Secretary of War, Governor Eustis; and also in a letter about the same time from Captain Woolsey of the Navy, to Commodore Chauncey. After some further remarks from Mr. C.

Mr. GOODE of Ohio, obtained the floor, and on his motion,

The House adjourned.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi gave notice on yesterday that he would ask leave to introduce, among other bills, a bill to regulate the fees of the clerks and marshals of the Federal court in the northern and southern districts of Mississippi. This title was incorrectly published on yesterday.

In the report of the proceedings of the House of Representatives yesterday, our Reporter omitted to notice that Mr. CHINN of Louisiana presented a petition signed by a large number of the citizens of the parish of Caddo, in the State of Louisiana, praying for a repeal of the laws of naturalization.

Mr. CHINN observed that as the House had, on a previous occasion, referred all such petitions to the Committee on the Judiciary, he moved a like reference of said petition; which was ordered by the House.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 15, 1840.

The SPEAKER announced that the order of the day was the motion of Mr. CASEY to refer the memorial of the National Road Convention, held at Terre Haute, Indiana, to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill appropriating $150,000 to each of the States of Ohio

Indiana, and Illinois, to be expended on the Cumberland road.

The substitute of Mr. PICKENS for said instructions, as follows:

"And that the memorial be committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to consider the expediency of reporting a bill in favor of the measure."

And Mr. MARVIN's amendment to the original proposition and substitute for Mr. PICKENS's amendment, as follows:

"And that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report bills in accordance with the estimates contained in the reports from the Chief Engineer, and the Chief of the Topographical Engineers, to the Secretary of War, and communicated to Congress by the President, making appropriations for the year 1840, for the continuation of the construction or improvements of harbors and roads and the navigation of rivers, for which appropriations have been heretofore made.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred the bill amendatory to the act for the taking of the sixth census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, asked the permission of Mr. GOODE of Ohio, who was entitled to the floor on the question announced as the order of the day, to give way, to enable him to report said bill. Mr. S. said it would not take ten minutes to pass the bill, as he presumed there would not be any debate on it. The marshals were all waiting for copies of some act similar to this, before they could proceed in their duties. He hoped the House would see the importance of acting upon it immediately.

Mr. CUSHING intimated that he had some amendments which he intended to offer, and which he had no doubt would cause debate.

Mr. SERGEANT was proceeding to show that the bill did not want any amendment, but was interrupted by Mr. GOODE, who could not yield the floor, as he believed the bill would lead to debate. He went on to reply to that part of the remarks of Mr. CRARY, of Michigan, in which that gentleman had gone into an examination of the conduct of Gen. Harrison, in his various military campaigns, and disapproved of his management of some of them, and particularly the battle of Tippacanoe, which had been previously eulogized by Mr. PROFFIT, of Indiana.

Mr. G. was sorry the subject had been introduced into the discussion on this bill; and, notwithstanding he seldom spoke, he could not refrain from doing so, in consequence of the course the debate had taken. He denied that the Indians had chosen the ground for General Harrison on which that battle was fought, and contended that he was not surprised by the Indians at that time, but was in the act of putting on his boots before the attack was made, and was on his horse in a few minutes after the first gun was fired. That battle was fought with much fury and great dexterity, and notwitstanding, as had been charged, the best blood of Kentucky had been freely shed on that occasion, it was not attributable to the want of military skill by General Harrison, or to his bad management. He then endeavored to show, from documents in hand, that the force of the Indians in that battle was not so much less than the forces of the General, as had been stated by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CRARY.] He went into an examination at great length of various documents, to show that General Harrison was entitled to great praise for his military exploits. Mr. G. then went into a history of the Cumberland road, and said it was identified with the policy of the Government, and estimates had been regularly made for its prosecution, and had received the sanction of the Government under every Administration, from and including that of Jefferson, until this year. He then argued that the faith of the Government was pledged to the completion of the work, and that if an appropriation be not now made, great loss will accrue to the Government in waste of materials already purchased, and dilapidation of bridges half finished.

The committee was not authorized to bring in a bill, because no estimates were before it; and the friends of the work were compelled to take some step to get the subject under the jurisdiction of the committee. He thought there could be no fairer way to do so than to instruct it to report a bill. If the emptiness of the Treasury was the reason why it had not been included in the estimates by the Departments, he thought it due to the House and the country that the President should have informed them of that fact. He went on to show that the Cumberland road had received the fostering care of the Government when the Treasury was in a more exhausted condition than it now is, and when a heavy debt was hanging over the nation. He believed the President had evaded the question intentionally, and that any effort to cut the Government loose from this road, would be tantamount to the separation of the Government from the interests of the people.

After Mr. GOODE had concluded,

Mr. CORWIN rose and obtained the floor, but gave way, at the request of Mr. JONES of Virginia, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means; when

The following message from the President of the United States was read:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before you a communication from the Secretary of War, accompanied by a report of the Commissioner of Pensions, showing the great importance of early action upon the bill from the Senate, providing for the continuance of the office of Commissioner of Pensions. The present law will expire by its own limitation on the fourth day of the next month, and sensible of the suffering which would be experienced by the pensioners by its suspension, I have deemed it my duty to bring the subject to your notice, and invite your early attention to it. M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14, 1840.

Mr. JONES of Virginia then observed that there was a bill lying on the Clerk's table to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions till the year 1842; and he moved that this bill be taken up, in order to make it the order of the day for Tuesday next; which motion being carried,

The bill to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions, and to transfer to that office, from the Navy Department, the business of navy pensions, was taken up and read the first and second times; when

Mr. JONES moved to refer it to the Committee of the Whole House, and make it the order of the day for Tuesday next. This motion being objected to as out of order, Mr. JONES gave notice that he would move to call up this bill on Tuesday next.

Mr. CORWIN having replied at some length to Mr. CRARY, and in vindication of the military skill of General Harrison, before concluding, yielded the floor to Mr. BELL, on whose motion, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, February 17, 1840.

The CHAIR presented a message from the President of the United States in regard to the necessity of an early provision by law for the protection of the Treasury against the fluctuations and contingencies to which its receipts are exposed; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BETTS presented the petition of Stephen Dunham, praying an increase of pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial of a number of citizens of New York, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a petition of citizens of New York, praying Congress to abolish imprisonment for debt throughout the United States, so far as they have the constitutional power; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the petition of the widow of John Nestor, for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the petition of citizens of Oneida county, New York, praying that the use of spiritous liquors may be prohibited in the army and navy of the United States; which was laid on the table.

Also, two petitions for the abolition of slavery the motion to receive which, was,

On motion of Mr. BROWN, laid on the table.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the memorial of the heirs of Thomas Delano; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented the petition of a number of citizens of Maine, for a Congress of Nations; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Also, a memorial of Joseph Pernell for an additional duty on imported silks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, documents relating to the claim of William Coley for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. YOUNG presented the memorial of the Mayor and Common Council of the city of Chicago, praying for an appropriation of land for the construction of a barrier to protect the city from inundation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. YOUNG also presented a preamble and resolution passed by the General Assembly of Illinois, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives of the said State in Congress to use their exertions to procure the passage of an act granting to that State, for public improvements, each alternate section on the different railroad routes in Illinois, or the whole of the unsold public lands lying within her limits, on condition that one-third the proceeds of the sales thereof should be paid to the General Government; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the memorial of Alexandre Vattemare, proposing a plan for the interchange of duplicates of books and specimens of natural history and the fine arts, between the Governments and other institutions of the civilized world, and recommending its adoption to the consideration of Congress; which was referred to the Joint Committee on the Library.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented to the Senate the first volume of Hazard's United States Commercial and Statistical Register, published at Philadelphia, together with a letter from the Editor, "suggesting whether it may not be a proper object for the patronage of Congress, and be a convenient work of reference and information to be attached to the offices of our foreign Ministers and Consuls."

Mr. BUCHANAN said, that from the slight examination he had made of his work, he believed it contained much valuable commercial and statistical information, which we ought all to possess; but which none of us would be willing to incur the labor of collecting for ourselves. He commended it, therefore, to the consideration of the Committee on the Library.

The Register and the letter of Mr. Hazard were then referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented two memorials of citizens of the United States, praying for the imposition of a duty on foreign silks; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. B. also presented twenty memorials, remonstrating against the use of bloodhounds in the Florida war; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. B. also presented two memorials for the Abolition of slavery; the motions to receive which, were,

On motion of Mr. FULTON, laid on the table.

Mr. DAVIS presented a memorial from citizens of Boston, recommending to the favorable consideration of Congress the memorial of Hall J. Kelly, on the subject of a colony in the Oregon Territory; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Oregon Territory.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the petition of the heirs of Richard K. Meade; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of citizens of New York, praying the passage of a bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. W. also presented the memorial of naturalized citizens of the city of New York, praying that Congress may take such measures as will secure the recognition of their rights as citizens of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

DISPOSITION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. DIXON said he held in his hand a set of resolutions, which had recently come to his honorable colleague and himself, passed by the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island, in favor of distributing the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the respective States.

The deep interest which the people of that State have long felt in that subject, has more than once induced them to express, through their Legislature, their views and claims in relation to it. History, sir, bears testimony that that State mingled its early exertions with the first and last efforts perilled by our country in that struggle on the result of which depended the acquisition of that domain.

Those in that State who took a bold part in the Revolution, and there were many—those who fought in the battles of that occasion—supposed they had paid the price, the dear price, which purchased their common interest in those lands; and their sons, sir, have hitherto believed themselves entitled to the same, as a part of their fair inheritance.

Those resolutions seem to have been drawn up with a view to a bill pending before Congress for the purpose of ceding those lands to the new States. But, sir, as the same subject will be before the Senate to-day, or very soon, on the resolutions introduced by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] in amendment, or by way of substitute, for the resolutions reported by the Select Committee, he would take occasion to introduce them at this time, and moved that the resolutions be read, printed, and laid on the table.

The resolutions were then read.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he had great respect for Rhode Island, as one of the States of the Union, and her Legislature; but he was compelled to think, from the very erroneous description which the resolutions gave of the bill* he had introduced, that the members had never seen it, and that they had taken their conceptions of it from the letter writers, many of whom dealt with truth as with fiction. The resolutions affirm that the cession proposed was without equivalent. Every member of the Senate knows that the assertion is without foundation. So far from a gratuitous cession, the bill provides that the States shall pay over one-half of the gross proceeds, leaving the other half to cover the expense, trouble, and responsibility of management. So far from a gift, he believed that the bill, if it should become a law, would bring as much into the Treasury, or nearly so, as the present system, besides the great political advantages, which he contemplated from the measure. Among these, a prominent one was, that it would reduce the patronage of the Government greatly, probably one-third, which he had supposed that gentlemen who professed to be so anxious to limit the power of the Executive, would not entirely overlook. Another was to arrest the growing conflict between the new and old States about the public lands, which ought, as he would have supposed, to have some value in the eyes of those who professed to be friends to the union and harmony of the States. And yet the Legislature of a respectable State, in the face of all this, has ventured to affirm, officially, in grave and solemn resolutions, that the cession was without equivalent! How is this to be accounted for, but on the supposition he had made, that the members have never seen or read the bill which they had undertaken to denounce?

Mr. DIXON replied to the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that he would not take upon himself to say that the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island were well advised of the details of the bill which the Senator had alluded to in his remarks. When they passed the resolutions now under consideration, whether they acted upon the authority of newspaper publications, as the honorable Senator had suggested, whether they had listened to the tongue of common fame, or availed themselves of any other source of information, or had acted from the suggestions of their own imagination, was not material, inasmuch as they were correct in point of fact. For, it is a truth, sir, there is a bill now pending in this Senate, for the purpose of transferring those public lands located within the geographical limits of certain new States, to those new States. Whether that cession, sir, is for a fair equivalent or not, did not enter into the consideration of the Legislature which passed those resolutions. They meant no comment upon its details; and however perfect that bill might seem, in the opinion of the honorable Senator, for the object intended thereby, yet the bill would be no less exceptionable to those who were opposed to the principle of the bill, and in favor of the distribution of the proceeds of the sales to the respective States.

Mr. CALHOUN. He did not object to any expression of opinion that the Legislature of Rhode Island might choose to make; but he had supposed that a Legislature owed it to itself, and a regard to truth, to make itself acquainted with the facts before it undertook to pronounce solemnly on the character of a measure. The Legislature of Rhode Island not having thought proper to do so on the present occasion, he felt called on, as the author of the measure, to notice the fact, lest his silence might be construed into an acquiescence in the truth of the resolutions, and thereby tend to strengthen the erroneous impression which is so industriously attempted to be made in reference to the bill.

Mr. CLAY was of opinion that the Legislature had pretty correctly described it. What said the bill? Did it not propose to give one-half for the management of the other? So the resolutions of the Legislature of Rhode Island could not be wholly incorrect; they were half right, at least, according to the provisions of the bill. We had extinguished the Indian titles in nine new States, and the whole cost of surveys and sales would not be more than five per centum; yet here, in one sweeping clause, it was contemplated to cede one-half, the result of which would ultimately be a cession of the whole. And why? The bill constitutes each new State a collector of this revenue, and their necessities might tempt them to use it, and year after year we should have applications to give time on these collections. Besides, the States might think proper to use paper circulating medium, while the hard money Administration would receive nothing but specie! Would you say to the State, you shall not sell you land for the money which you are content to use among yourselves? These, with other causes, would in a few years become so perplexing and so embarrassing, that we should be glad to relinquish the whole. Mr. C. alluded to the remark in relation to the diminution of the patronage of the General Government. That, he admitted, was very desirable; but then it might be effected as too great a sacrifice. Suppose we were asked to get rid of the Army or Navy to diminish the patronage of the Government, should we do it? And yet here was a plan to get rid of a thousand millions of acres to diminish patronage. Such a plan, he thought, could not command the serious approbation even of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. CALHOUN. The Senator himself admits the false statement of the resolutions, while he undertakes to show that they are not so to the degree he had stated. Instead of no equivalent, as they assert, he admits that one half, at least, is to be paid over to the Union; but in this he does not do justice to the measure. The fifty per cent. of the gross proceeds to be paid over was on his part but a conjectural estimate, liable to be raised or diminished by the committee before whom the bill now is, as the result of a careful examination of all the facts of the case might require to do justice to the Government and the States. His object was to allow such a compensation to the States as would not only cover all the expense and trouble of administration, but would make it their interest to manage the lands with prudence and economy.

As to the consequences which the Senator had undertaken to trace, he would not attempt to follow him and point out his errors, as he was determined not to be forced, on an occasion so unsuitable, into a discussion on the general merits of the measure. He, however, would say, that he had no confidence in the Senator's results, as he presumed he had none in his. But when the proper time arrives, he would be prepared to meet the Senator or any other opponent, and to show that the bill, in every view in which it could be regarded, political, moral, and fiscal, was perfectly defensible.

*For the purpose of elucidation, the bill which was the occasion of the discussion is annexed:

A BILL to cede the public lands within the limits of the new States, on certain conditions therein mentioned.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all the public lands within the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Michigan, with the exceptions of the sites of fortifications, navy and dock yards, arsenals, magazines, and all other public buildings shall, after the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, be ceded to the States within the limits of which they are respectively situated, they having previously complied with the following conditions:

First. That the said States shall severally pass acts, to be irrevocable, that they will annually pay to the United States fifty per cent. on the gross amount of the sales of such lands, on or before the first day of February of each succeeding year.

Secondly. That the minimum price, as now fixed by law, shall remain unchanged until the thirtieth day of June, aforesaid; but after that period the price may be reduced by the States respectively, according to the following scale all lands theretofore offered at public sale, and then remaining unsold ten years or upward, preceding the thirtieth day of June aforesaid, may be reduced by said States to a price not less than one dollar per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold fifteen years or upwards, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, may thereafter be reduced by said States to a price not less than seventy-five cents per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold twenty years or upward, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, may then be reduced by said States to a price not less than fifty cents per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold twenty-five years or upwards, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, may thereafter be reduced by said States to a price not less than twenty-five cents per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold thirty years or upwards, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, shall be ceded immediately to the States in which said lands are situate: Provided, That all lands which shall remain unsold after having been offered at public sale for ten years, and which do not come under the above provisions, shall be subject to the provisions of graduation and cession aforesaid at the respective periods of ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, and thirty years after said sale, commencing from the expiration of ten years after the same had been offered at public sale.

Thirdly. That the lands shall be subject to the same legal subdivisions in the sale and survey as is now provided by law, reserving for each township the sixteenth section, or the substitute, as heretofore provided by law; and the land not yet offered for sale, shall be first offered by the State at public auction and be sold for cash only, in the manner now provided by law. And any land now or hereafter remaining unsold after the same shall have been offered for sale at public auction, shall be subject to entry for cash only, according to the graduation which may be fixed by the States respectively, under the provisions of this act; and that the acts of Congress which may be in force at the time of assenting to this act, shall remain unchanged, except as modified by this act, unless with the assent of Congress.

Fourth. This cession, together with the portion of the sales to be retained by the States respectively, under the provisions of this act, shall be in full of the five per cent. fund, or any part thereof, not already accrued to any State; and the said States shall be exclusively liable for all charges that may hereafter arise from the surveys, sales, and management of the public lands and extinguishment of Indian title within the limits of said States respectively.

Fifth. That, on a failure to comply with any of the above conditions, or a violation of the same on the part of any of the said States, the cession herein made to the State failing to comply with, or violating said conditions, shall be thereby rendered null and void; and all grants or titles thereafter made by said State, for any portion of the public lands within the limits of the same ceded by this act, shall be, and are hereby declared to be, null and void, and of no effect whatever.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever the President of the United States shall be officially notified that any of the States aforesaid has passed an act in compliance with the above conditions, it shall be his duty, after the thirtieth day of June aforesaid, or forthwith after the passage of said act if passed subsequent to that period, to adopt such measures as he shall think proper to close the land offices, including the surveying department, within the limits of said State; and that the commissions of all officers connected therewith shall expire on a day to be fixed by him, but which day shall not be beyond six months after the thirtieth day of June aforesaid, of if subsequent thereto, from the day he received the official notification of the the passage of said act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That on such notification being made, the said State shall be relieved from all compacts, acts, or ordinance, imposing restrictions on the right of said State to tax any lands by her authority subsequent to the sale thereof, ceded by this act; and all maps, titles, records, books, documents, and papers, in the General Land Office at Washington, relative to said lands, shall be subject to the order and disposition of the Executive of said State.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all lands of the United States within the limits of the State of Tennessee, with the exceptions enumerated in the first section of this act, shall be, and the same are hereby, ceded to said State.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from South Carolina has been pleased to say that he has no confidence in me. Sir, I reciprocate it with all my heart, and go a step further, and say I have no confidence in the Senator, whether in the past, present, or future. [Mr. CALHOUN. I said in your results.] Well, I apply it to the views of the Senator. Instead of asserting what he will do, and in a bold and rapid manner drawing his own results from his own facts, and saying, "I defy the Senator to show," &c. let us discuss the subject before an impartial tribunal, the people. That was the true way to proceed to trial. The Senator's description of his own arguments was quite equal to his opinion of his own powers; but (said Mr. C.) let us meet at Philippi, or any where else, on this subject, and I will pledge myself to show it is one of the most wanton, wasteful, and extravagant measures that ever emanated from any public man.

Mr. CALHOUN. It would seem to be the object of the Senator to get up an excitement on every subject with which he was connected. He had risen to correct the erroneous statement of the resolutions, in reference to a measure with which he was connected. This he had done in the least offensive language he could command, that did any thing like justice to himself. The Senator thought proper to interfere, and, as usual, to give a personal turn to the discussion. He had no taste for such things. We came here to do the public business, and not to amuse the galleries, or indulge in personal altercations. He was no way responsible for such disreputable scenes, for the truth of which he appealed to the Senate. He had throughout limited himself to the defensive.

Mr. CLAY said the Senator made appeals to the Senate whether "he had ever made assaults on the Senator from Kentucky." If he were so disposed, he, too, might appeal to the Senate and to truth—who began this matter. When he (Mr. C.) rose to make a remark or two on the bill, not to argue its merits, the Senator said he had no confidence in my results. Was that language proper or parliamentary, or was it the language of courtesy? He understood very well the wily course of the Senator—it was to give a thrust, and place himself in the amiable attitude of self-defence. Mr. C. then stated, as he now stated, that the bill was a clear grant of one moiety to the new States, which, in its inevitable consequence, would end in the absolute relinquishment of the whole; and the Senator chooses to construe that into an assault. And speaking in his own person—his favorite person—first person singular—"I will show—I will defy—I have no confidence in the results of the Senator." I repeat that I am as unwilling as any Senator to indulge in personalities, and as little in the habit of doing so. In that business I have been more sinned against than sinning. I have been far more an object of attack than the Senator from South Carolina—as well in the Senate as by the public press, and in private circles. I have sometimes treated it with contempt, sometimes with indignation, but have never been so peculiarly sensitive as the Senator. Mr. C. said the Senator and himself stood in "antagonistical" positions—their feelings all differed, moral, political, and social, and he had no idea that the Senator should cover himself with the cloak of sympathy, and give a thrust without being met. I stand (said Mr. C.) like the Senator from South Carolina, on my reserved rights! And especially in relation to this land bill I feel, and mean to assert that right.

Mr. CALHOUN. The excitement of the Senator has no effect upon me. I am perfectly cool, and am determined to keep so. He attributes to me offensive language, because I said I had no confidence in his results; but forgot to add that I coup'ed it with the declaration that I presumed he had none in mine. I had supposed that my meaning could not be misunderstood. The Senator undertook to show that my bill, though not in fact what the resolution asserted it to be, would be so in its results. To reply to him, would necessarily have opened the discussion on its general merits. I did not think it the proper occasion; nor did I feel that I would be justified in consuming the hour allotted to the morning's business in the discussion of a measure in the hands of a committee, and not before the Senate. To avoid the discussion, without seeming to acquiesce in the deductions of the Senator, I declared my want of confidence in his results, and, to remove the possibility of offence, I coupled it with the declaration I did. Nor is the charge of egotism better founded. In affirming that I was prepared to meet him, or any other opponent of the measure, and to make good its defence, I made no boast of superiority, as he supposes. My reliance was on the goodness of the measure, and not on any assumed superiority. The Senate will remember that I placed my remarks expressly on the ground of my entire confidence in the measure, viewed in all possible lights, political, moral, and fiscal. The Senator, in his excitability, instead of regarding what I said in its connection, fixes on an isolated word, or member of a sentence, and breaks forth into personalities; and then, when repelled, turns round and charges that he has been attacked. These things are far from being pleasant; I regard them as unbecoming the body, and the age and standing of the Senator and myself, and I engage in them with reluctance, and only when forced to it in self defence.

Mr. KNIGHT rose, and said it seemed to him, on reading the resolutions of the Legislature of Rhode Island, that the Senator from South Carolina misconceived the intention of the Legislature, in supposing that the Legislature intended to censure that gentleman; they were opposed to his bill, and had expressed an opinion against it—not only against that bill, but against all other propositions to cede the public lands to any of the States without a proper equivalent. The Legislature did not believe that his bill provided such an equivalent, and passed resolutions against the general principles of it.

The Legislature (said Mr. K.) is in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, dividing the proceeds of the public lands among all the States, and has expressed an opinion in favor of that measure, but with no intention of casting censure on the Senator from South Carolina. A cursory reading of the resolutions clearly satisfies my mind that there is no censure of the Senator contained in them; and I am confident, from the knowledge I possess of the gentlemen who compose that Legislature, that no such intention was entertained by them: but that they are decidedly opposed to the bill introduced by that Senator is certain, and as strongly in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky.

The question was then taken, and the resolutions were ordered to be printed and laid on the table.

Mr. PRESTON presented the memorial of Charles Brenan; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented the memorial of George W. Osborne and others against the employment of bloodhounds in the Florida war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the petition of Hugh Stewart; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MERRICK presented memorials from the presidents and directors of the Bank of Washington, the Bank of Potomac, and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, severally praying for a renewal of their charters; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WALKER presented a preamble and resolutions passed by the Legislature of Mississippi, instructing their Senators, and requesting their Representatives, to use their exertions to procure the establishment of a mail route from Jackson, Miss. to Tuscaloosa, Ala.; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill authorizing the States to tax any lands within their limits, sold by the United States, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred a bill to amend the act entitled "an act to amend an act entitled 'an act for laying off the towns of Fort Madison and Burlington, in the county of Des Moines, and the towns of Belleview, Du Buque, and Peru, in the county of Du Buque, Territory of Wisconsin, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1837,'" reported the same without amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Conn. from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Maj. Daniel Piatt; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the petition of the heirs of Anderson Lane, made an unfavorable report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. L. from the same committee, to which was referred a bill for the relief of the heirs of Miguel Eslava, reported it back without amendment.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the memorial of Sarah Ralston, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of John Purdy, made an unfavorable report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which were referred

The petition of Aaron Camp;
The petition of Ebenezer Swan; and
The petition of Susannah Pickett;

made unfavorable reports thereon.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred a bill making certain military roads in the State of Arkansas, reported the same with amendments.

On motion by Mr. WALL, the bill for the relief of John H. Sheppard, administrator of Abiel Wood, was taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and, after consideration, was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the memorials on the subject of employing bloodhounds in the Florida war, presented the following communication from the Secretary of War, and the committee was discharged for the further consideration of the subject.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
February 17, 1840.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th instant, transmitting from the Committee on Military Affairs a number of memorials against the employment of bloodhounds in the present war with the Indians in Florida, for such answer thereto as the occasion may require from the Executive branch of the Government. As I have had occasion to answer similar inquiries made by a member of the House of Representatives, I beg leave to transmit to the committee a copy of that communication, which, in part, furnishes the information required.

There can be no doubt, from the respectable character of the memorialists, that they are animated by humane motives in remonstrating against the use of these dogs; but it is equally certain that they are deceived when they suppose that their employment will degrade the character of the country, or render its officers obnoxious to the charge of cruelty. It was doubtless the intention of the authorities of Florida, when they imported the bloodhounds, to use them as guides to discover the lurking places of the Indians, not, as has been erroneously believed, to worry or destroy them; and this Department has given positive instructions to that effect, if they should be employed by any officers in the service of the Government, as will be seen by the accompanying copy of a letter to the Commanding General in Florida. The Government was not consulted on the subject of the importation of these dogs by the Governor and Council of Florida, and was ignorant of the transaction until after their arrival in the Territory; but this Department did not feel itself justified in forbidding their use. The inhabitants of Florida have been cruelly harassed, and all their efforts, and those of our troops, have hitherto proved unavailing to protect their families from the murderous assaults of the savages. If they believe that this cannot be effected but by the superior sagacity of these dogs, it would be inhuman to prevent them from making use of what they regard as the only means of saving their wives and children from the tomahawk and scalping knife.

I beg leave to transmit herewith a copy of a letter from A. L. Magennis, esq. of St. Louis, which contains his impressions respecting the object for which these dogs were procured, and the manner in which they are to be used, derived during a short stay which he was obliged to make in Tallahassee about the time the dogs arrived in Florida.

The memorials are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
J. R. POINSETT.

Hon. THOMAS H. BENTON,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs.

WASHINGTON CITY, Feb. 8, 1840.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request that I would communicate in writing what I had previously mentioned in conversation, as having heard while passing through Florida, on my way here, respecting the bloodhounds recently brought there from Cuba, and the purpose for which they were procured, I beg leave to state that, on the 6th ult. during a sojourn of two or three days at Tallahassee, while paying a visit at the residence of the present Governor, a gentleman entered the parlor, who was introduced as Col. Fitzpatrick, and who informed Governor Reid that he had just arrived from Cuba with a number of bloodhounds, to obtain which he had been despatched, as I understood him, under authority from ex-Governor Call, and the Legislature of Florida. Col. Fitzpatrick spoke of the difficulties which he had had in getting those dogs, thirty-three in number; the high price paid for them, and the great trouble arising from boisterous weather and scarcity of provisions, owing to the voyage being of unusual length, in bringing them over; he expressed a desire that Governor Reid should give immediate instructions to have them taken from on board the vessel, then lying at Port Leon, or St. Marks, as they were very much reduced and feeble from want of proper food, and put in some fit place, under the charge of five Spaniards, whom he had hired in Cuba as their keepers, and who were the only persons capable of properly managing them. A good deal was said as to the manner in which they were to be used in operating a gainst the Indians; and, I believe, as well as I can recollect, and my recollection is pretty distinct, Col. Fitzpatrick, who appeared most conversant with the mode of keeping and using them, observed that they were always muzzled, unless when being fed; that when employed, in order to discover a hiding or retreating enemy, a keeper was appointed to each dog, to hold him in leash, and endeavor to put him on the scent, which, once found, he rarely lost; the pursuers following close up to the keeper, and were thus conducted to the object of their search.

The dogs were described by Col. Fitzpatrick as possessing fine wind, great strength, bottom, and courage, and as differing from the common hound in one particular, which made them of infinite service in chase of a lurking enemy: they rarely or never gave tounge to warn him of the approach of his pursuers. I was not led to believe, from any thing which I heard on the occasion alluded to, or, indeed, at any other time during my journey through Florida, that those dogs were to be unmuzzled and let slip to assail the hostile marauding Indian warriors, and destroy their women and children. I am persuaded that the people of Florida, dreadfully as they have suffered from the ferocity of the Indians, would not countenance such a species of warfare.

Col. Fitzpatrick, who, I have since learned, is an officer of the Florida militia, struck me as being a gentleman of great intelligence and decided character.

I have the honor to be, &c.
ARTHUR L. MAGENIS.

To the Hon. Mr. POINSETT,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
December 30, 1839.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th inst., inquiring into the truth of the assertion made by the public papers, that the Government had determined to use bloodhounds in the war against the Florida Indians, and beg to assure you that it will afford me great pleasure to give you all the information on this subject in possession of the Department.

From the time I first entered upon the duties of the War Department, I continued to receive letters from officers commanding in Florida, as well as from the most enlightened citizens of that Territory, urging the employment of bloodhounds as the most efficient means of terminating the atrocities daily perpetrated by the Indians on the settlers in that Territory. To these proposals no answer was given, until, in the month of August, 1839, while at the Virginia Springs, there was referred to me from the Department a letter addressed to the Adjutant General, by the officer commanding the forces in Florida, General Taylor, to the following effect:

HEADQUARTERS, ARMY OF THE SOUTH,
Fort Brooke, July 28, 1838.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose you a communication, this moment received, on the subject of procuring bloodhounds from the island of Cuba to aid the army in its operations against the hostiles in Florida.

I am decidedly in favor of the measure, and beg leave again to urge it as the only means of ridding the country of the Indians, who are now broken up into small parties that take shelter in swamps and hammocks as the army approaches, making it impossible for us to follow or overtake them without the aid of such auxiliaries.

Should this measure meet the approbation of the Department, and the necessary authority be granted, I will open a correspondence on the subject with Mr. Evertson, through Major Hunt, Assistant Quartermaster at Savannah, and will authorize him, if it can be done on reasonable terms, to employ a few dogs, with persons who understand their management.

I wish it distinctly understood that my object in employing dogs, is only to ascertain where the Indians can be found, not to worry them.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient serv't,
Z. TAYLOR,
Bt. Br. Gen. U. S. A. Commanding.

To Gen. R JONES, Washington, D. C.

On this letter I endorsed the following decision, which was communicated to General Taylor: "I have always been of opinion that dogs ought to be employed in this warfare to protect the army from surprises and ambuscades, and to track the Indian to his lurking place; but supposed, if the General believed them to be necessary, he would not hesitate to take measures to procure them. The cold-blooded and inhuman murders lately perpetrated upon helpless women and children by these ruthless savages, render it expedient that every possible means should be resorted to in order to protect the people of Florida, and to enable the United States forces to follow and capture, or destroy, the savage and unrelenting foe. General Taylor is therefore authorized to procure such number of dogs as he may judge necessary, it being expressly understood that they are to be employed to track and discover the Indians, not to worry or destroy them."

This is the only action or correspondence on the part of the Department that has ever taken place in relation to the matter. The General took no measures to carry into effect his own recommendation, and this Department has never since renewed the subject. I continue, however, to entertain the opinion expressed in the above decision. I do not believe that description of dog, called the bloodhound, necessary to prevent surprise or track the Indian murderer; but I still think that every cabin, every military post, and every detachment, should be attended by dogs. That precaution might have saved Dade's command from massacre, and by giving timely warning, have prevented many of the cruel murders which have been committed by the Indians in Middle Florida. The only successful pursuit of Indian murderers that I know of, was on a late occasion, when the pursuers were aided by the sagacity of their dogs. These savages had approached a cabin of peaceful and industrious settlers so stealthily, that the first notice of their presence was given by a volley from their rifles thrust between the logs of the house; and the work of death was finished by tomahawking the women, after tearing from them their infant children, and dashing their brains out against the door-posts. Are these ruthless savages to escape and repeat such scenes of blood because they can elude our fellow-citizens in Florida, and our regular soldiers, and baffle their unaided efforts to overtake or discover them? On a late occasion, three estimable citizens were killed in the immediate neighborhood of St. Augustine, and one officer of distinguished merit mortally wounded. It is in evidence that these murders were committed by two Indians, who, after shooting down the father and beating out the son's brains with the butts of their rifles, upon hearing the approach of the volunteers, retired a few yards into the woods, and secreted themselves until the troops returned to town with the dead bodies of those who had been thus inhumanly and wantonly butchered. It is to be regretted that this corps had not been accompanied with one or two hunters, who, with their dogs, might have tracked the blood stained footsteps of these Indians; have restored to liberty the captive they were dragging away with them, and have prevented them from ever again repeating such atrocities. Nor could the severest casuist object to our fellow-citizens in Florida resorting to such measures in order to protect the lives of their women and children.

Very respectfully,
Your most ob't serv't,
J. R. POINSETT.

Hon. HENRY A. WISE, House of Representatives.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
January 26, 1840.

SIR: It is understood by the Department, although not officially informed of the fact, that the authorities of the Territory of Florida have imported a pack of bloodhounds from the Island of Cuba; and I think it proper to direct, in the event of those dogs being employed by any officer of officers under your command, that their use be confined, altogether, to tracking the Indians; and in order to ensure this, and to prevent the possibility of their injuring any person whatsoever, that they be muzzled when in the field, and held with a leash while following the track of the enemy.

Very respectfully, your most ob't serv't,
J. R. POINSETT.

Brig. Gen. Z. TAYLOR,
Commanding Army of the South, Florida.

THE UNFINISHED BUSINESS.

The CHAIR announced that the unfinished business of Friday could now be taken up; which was the motion of Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Finance, that certain documents on the salt business should be printed.

Mr. LUMPKIN suggested whether, before they proceeded in any further argument on this subject, it would not be better to have a copy of the work on each Senator's desk, and then they might vote understandingly on the question of printing an extra number.

The CHAIR stated that the question before the Senate was only for printing the usual number for the use of the Senate.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky and Mr. DAVIS stated that they had no objection to printing the usual number; and the printing was ordered.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to the Senate such information as he may possess, showing the necessity of further legislation in regard to the papers of vessels bound on foreign voyages.

SPECIAL ORDER.

The resolutions connected with the report of the Select Committee on the assumption of the State debts were taken up, as follows:

1. Resolved, That the assumption, directly or indirectly, by the General Government, of the debts which have been, or may be, contracted by the States for local objects or State purposes, would be unjust, both to the States and to the people.

2. Resolved, That such assumption would be highly inexpedient, and dangerous to the Union of the States.

3. Resolved, That such assumption would be wholly unauthorized by, and in violation of, the Constitution of the United States, and utterly repugnant to all the objects and purposes for which the Federal Union was formed.

4. Resolved, That to set apart the public lands, or the revenues arising therefrom, for the beforementioned purposes, would be equally unjust, inexpedient, and unconstitutional.

The question was on the substitute offered by Mr. CRITTENDEN, as follows:

Resolved, That the debts of the several States, so far as they are known to the Senate, have been contracted in the exercise of the undoubted right and constitutional power of said States respectively, and that there is no ground to warrant any doubt of the ability or disposition of those States to fulfil their contracts.

Resolved, That it would be just and proper to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States, in fair and rateable proportions, and that the condition of such of the States as have contracted debts is such at the present moment of pressure and difficulty as to render such distribution especially expedient and important.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked the CHAIR if it would be in order to amend the resolutions offered by the Select Committee, and being answered in the affirmative, said that for the purpose of placing himself in a correct position, and to avoid voting against what he deemed the truth, he would move that the original resolutions should be amended by adding thereto, as a distinct and separate resolution, the first resolution of the substitute. Whilst he should most freely vote that it was unconstitutional, inexpedient, and unjust, for Congress to assume the payment of the existing debts of the States, he was anxious, at the same time, to express his entire confidence both in the ability and will of these States to pay their debts honestly and in good faith. In the expression of this opinion, he would go as far as the Senator from Kentucky, and was, therefore, willing to adopt his resolution on this particular branch of the subject.

Mr. PHELPS, who was entitled to the floor, not being present, the further consideration of the subject was postponed until to morrow.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business,

After which, it adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, February 17, 1840.

Mr. J. W. JONES, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, would, by the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CORWIN,] move that the House would, on to-morrow, at the hour of one o'clock, resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering the bill for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensioners, and that it be made the special order for that and the succeeding day, in preference to all other business, until disposed of.

Mr. LAWRENCE, before the question was taken, and in order that the House might understand the position of this bill, would, by its permission, make a few remarks. The amount of the pension fund, now applicable to the payment of the pensions becoming due on the 4th of March, was $1,294,000, which was in the hands of forty-one agents appointed the Government. There was no law for the transfer of these funds from one agency to another. There were, to be sure, general laws for the transfer of appropriations, which gentlemen supposed to apply to the pension fund, but they did not; and there was no law by which these moneys could be transferred from one point to another. In consequence of this, if this bill is not passed by this House in the next forty-eight hours, the pensioners will not receive what is their due. These pensioners are scattered all over the United States, and there were now left but fifteen days in which to make the transfers. Under these circumstances, Mr. L. appealed to gentlemen on both sides of the House not to discuss this bill. It must pass; and if gentlemen wished to arraign the Administration, he hoped they would do it on some other question than this. I make these remarks, said Mr. L. because it is due to ourselves and to the country that this bill should pass to-day or to-morrow, and to let these pensioners have the money on which they subsist. He would move to take up this bill now, as it could be passed in a few minutes, but as the chairman of the committee [Mr. JONES, of Virginia] had suggested to-morrow, he was willing to wait until that time.

The SPEAKER said that the motion of the gentleman from Virginia could only be received by general consent.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON said he objected to the motion, and would continue to object to taking up any bill while the bill for the protection of Florida, where the Indians were scalping our women and children, was lying on the table.

Mr. JONES of Virginia then moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to offer his motion, and called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RUSSELL suggested to the gentleman from Virginia the expediency of modifying his motion so as to make the bill the order of the day for two o'clock, instead of one to-morrow. It was well known that the standing committees had not had an opportunity of reporting from the commencement of the session until now. Mr. R. then moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, so as to make the bill the order of the day for two-o'clock to-morrow.

The CHAIR said the motion of the gentleman from New York was not in order, the rules not having yet been suspended, and the motion of the gentleman from Virginia not before the House.

The question was then put and carried—yeas 166, nays 1; so the rules having been suspended,

Mr. JONES of Virginia submitted the following resolution, and moved the previous question on it:

Resolved, That this House will, on to-morrow, at one o'clock, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider House bill No. 3, and that it be the special order at that time, and at the same hour every succeeding day, until the bill be disposed of, and that it take precedence of all other business.

The resolution having been read, the call for the previous question was seconded by the House, when the main question was put, and the resolution was adopted without a division.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported without amendment the bill from the Senate to amend the act providing for taking the sixth census, and moved to refer the same to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union; which motion was adopted.

After some conversation between Messrs. CORWIN, LINCOLN, and the SPEAKER, whether the subject under discussion, on Saturday last, was the first thing in order to-day,

Mr. CORWIN, to avoid any discussion on a point of order, moved that the subject then before the House be now taken up for consideration, which was agreed to; when

The SPEAKER announced that the question before the House was the motion of Mr. CASEY to refer the memorial of the National Road Convention, held at Terre Haute, Indiana, to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill appropriating $150,000 to each of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to be expended on the Cumberland road.

The substitute of Mr. PICKENS for said instructions, as follows:

"And that the memorial be committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to consider the expediency of reporting a bill in favor of the measure."

And Mr. MARVIN'S amendment to the original proposition and substitute for Mr. PICKEN'S amendment, as follows:

"And that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report bills in accordance with the estimates contained in the reports from the Chief Engineer, and the Chief of the Topographical Engineers, to the Secretary of War, and communicated to Congress by the President, making appropriations for the year 1840, for the continuation of the construction or improvements of harbors and roads the navigating of rivers, for which appropriations have been heretofore made.

Mr. CORWIN, who was entitled to the floor, in continuation of his remarks on Saturday, replied at great length to the constitutional objections of Mr. PICKENS to the passage of any bill making appropriations for this road. That gentleman, he said, had congratulated himself and the country, that the Constitution, which had been administered in such a way that it was entirely different from what it was intended by its framers, was about to be restored to its purity. If that gentleman's position was correct, he conceived it very unfortunate and most extraordinary that the framers of that instrument had committed such gross errors in expounding and administering it for so many years; for he believed that Washington and his cabinet, and Madison, Jefferson, and Monroe, as would be seen from their recorded opinions, were in favor of this road, and conceived it perfectly constitutional. Mr. C. then argued at great length, to show the existence of a contract between the Government and the new States for the completion of this road, and that the contract had not been complied with on the part of the Government. No one could deny, or dared deny, that the agreement did exist, which was all the friends of the measure wanted—and unless the opponents of it could show that the contracting parties had no right, under the Constitution, to make the agreement, it was obligatory on the part of the General Government to fulfil its provisions to the letter, by constructing this road to and through the State of Ohio. Those States through which the road runs, as a party to the contract, gave up the right to tax 122,000,000 of acres of land, subject to taxation by them. It was an object of the most earnest anxiety by the Federal Government to get the States to relinquish this right—a right which Mr. Gallatin said they possessed, not only to tax land sold by the Government, but also that remaining unsold. Four sovereign States gave up this right, for five years, to tax this quantity of land, which, at $2 per 100 acres, amounted, in round numbers, to 12,200,000 dollars. The amount expended in the States, under the contract, he was understood to say, was little over three millions; and thus the Government had cleared about 8 000,000 by the operation. He wished the State Rights party to remember this when they compared these States to mendicants at the National Treasury, because they demanded a fulfilment of the obligations of the agreement. Mr. C. maintained that the Cumberland road was a great national and military road and commercial highway; and that the same reasons existed for the continuation of it now, as there did when it was commenced, as a means of defence of the Western frontier; and instanced the large body of Indians, 60,000 strong, now concentrated on the frontier, to which it was intended this road should be carried. He did not claim the appropriation as a matter of favor, but on the ground of justice and right. As it seemed that the greatest objection to making it at this time, was on account of the low state of the Treasury, he examined the estimates, and showed that sufficient curtailment could be made on unnecessary objects, to progress with this road, and yet keep the expenditures of this year within the gross amount of the estimates. He also showed the loss which the Government would sustain if an appropriation was not speedily made.

The SPEAKER said that there was an important communication from the Executive, on his table, which he would beg leave, at that time, to lay before the House; which was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I submit to Congress a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, repeating suggestions contained in his annual report, in regard to the necessity of an early provision by law for the protection of the Treasury against the fluctuations and contingencies to which its receipts are exposed, with additional facts and reasons in favor of the propriety of the legislation then desired.

The application assumes that although the means of the Treasury for the whole year may be equal to the expenditures of the year, the Department may, notwithstanding, be rendered unable to meet the claims upon it at the times when they fall due. This apprehension arises partly from the circumstance that the largest proportion of the charges upon the Treasury, including the payment of pensions, and the redemption of Treasury notes, fall due in the early part of this year, viz: in the months of March and May, while the resources, on which it might otherwise rely, to discharge them, cannot be made available until the last half of the year, and partly from the fact that a portion of the means of the Treasury consists of debts due from banks, for some of which delay has already been asked, and which may not be punctually paid.

Considering the injurious consequences to the character, credit, and business of the country, which would result from a failure by the Government for even so short a period, to meet its engagements—that the happening of such a contingency can only be effectually guarded against by the exercise of legislative authority—that the period, when such disability must arise, if at all, and which, at the commencement of the session, was comparatively remote, has now approached so near as a few days, and that the provision asked for is only intended to enable the Executive to fulfil existing obligations, and chiefly by anticipating funds not yet due, without making any additions to the public burdens, I have deemed the subject of sufficient urgency and importance again to ask for it your early attention.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, 17th February, 1840.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Feb. 15, 1840.

SIR: The duty entrusted to this Department of supervising the execution of such laws as are connected with the fiscal operations of the Government, induces me to make to you the following communication.

In the annual report on the finances, submitted to Congress near the commencement of its present session, I had the honor to state, in substance, that if the new appropriations should not exceed in amount the estimates then offered, and if the indebted banks should meet their obligations with punctuality, the receipts for the whole year would probably equal the expenditures.

After the lapse of nearly three months, those views remain unchanged, except so far as subsequent events, heretofore communicated to you and to Congress, may in some degree affect them. But whether those events, viz: new constructions of the tariff laws by the courts, and increased embarrassments of business in consequence of the suspension of specie payments by the banks continuing over a large part of the United States, will reduce the revenue so much as to render new means on those accounts indispensable, cannot yet be decided with certainty. But it may be ascertained before Congress adjourns, and can then, if necessary, be suitably provided for.

It was also stated in the annual report, that the uncertainty of receiving prompt payment from the banks, and the convenience of having a larger balance on hand in the Treasury than was likely to exist, as well as the fact that the greatest debts due from the banks were not payable till the last half of the year, while the largest expenditures were charged on the first half of it, and particularly on the month of March, required some adequate provision of means to meet those contingencies and inequalities, and rendered "the earliest attention to new legislation on this subject" "highly prudent, if not indispensable, for the effectual security of the public credit."

The prompt adoption of such precautionary measure was further urged, on general grounds of expediency, considering the existing embarrassments of the country, the suspension of specie payments by many of the banks, and the fluctuations and uncertainties to which our receipts and expenditures were, from various causes then enumerated, constantly exposed. The experience and occurrences during nearly one-fourth of a year, which has since elapsed, have strengthened the impression then entertained on this point; and in official communications since made to the appropriate committees of Congress and yourself, I took the liberty to repeat my conviction of the continued urgency and importance of the measure previously recommended in relation to it.

But no action having yet taken place concerning this subject, though the period is near at hand, when the due maintenance of the public credit seems most imperatively to require it, I shall proceed to state, with more minuteness than heretofore, some of the circumstances which make such a provision so essential at the present moment. Early as the 5th and 7th of March, a very large amount of pensions and Treasury notes become due, in addition to other and ordinary demands. They will exceed, in the aggregate, two and one-quarter millions of dollars, and for the payment of which funds are yet to be advanced by the Treasury to the amount of about - $1,450,000

On the 13th of March, more Treasury notes fall due, not yet redeemed, computed at - - - -	250,000
Others fall due and are redeemable in the rest of March, April, and May, estimated at - - -	1,150,000
	$2,850,000

These constitute an aggregate of burdens but little short of three millions, beside other payments for ordinary objects.

The estimates of all the receipts and all the expenditures, for these and other objects, during that period, with the available balance of money now on hand in the Treasury, are detailed in the statement annexed, marked A.

From those particulars it will be seen that, in order to be able to discharge all anticipated claims punctually, and retain on hand the appropriate balance of about two millions for common purposes, a provision of means is expedient to the extent of four and three-fourths millions of dollars, subject to be used in whole or in part, as may be found necessary to meet the public exigencies, under all the uncertainties to which our financial operations are liable.

At this late day, a power to issue Treasury notes, instead of those heretofore or hereafter redeemed, or to make a temporary loan to that extent, subject to be redeemed after sixty or ninety days' notice, seems the best, and, in fact, the only effectual method of providing such means, until the receipts, in the last half of the year, or subsequently, may enable the Department to extinguish any debt incurred.

An increase of the tariff, or a recall of deposites from the States, would be too slow in their operations for obtaining adequate funds seasonably, as some of them will be needed within two or three weeks.

To confer an efficient power, to procure necessary means, would make no addition to the public burdens, but merely aid the Executive branch of the Government to execute the laws with fidelity, by discharging appropriations already imposed by Congress; and to the prompt payment of which the public faith has been solemnly pledged. The propriety of doing it, therefore, seems too obvious to require further comment.

Having submitted these views, in addition to those heretofore presented on the same subject, this Department, except under new authority from Congress, can accomplish nothing more than to continue to meet the public engagements to such an extent as may be practicable, however imperfectly, under the existing laws and the means already at its disposal. Respectfully,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States.

(A.)

Money in the Treasury 10th of February, 1840, available for general purposes, computed to be about $1,700,000, but at the end of the month it will probably be reduced to -	$1,300,000
Not over two-thirds of this will be situated on the seaboard, and convenient for use to pay pensions, and redeem Treasury notes.
Receipts, in March, April and May, from customs and lands, estimated at - - - - -	3,600,000
Receipts from banks in those months, indebted in 1837 as depositories, estimated at - - -	200,000
Now and before the 1st June, computed aggregate means - -	$5,100,000
Expenditures for pensions required by 5th March, as estimated by the War Department at $1,760,000, of which will then be needed, besides what has been recently advanced, about - - - -	$900,000
Treasury notes falling due by March 7th, not yet redeemed - -	550,000
Treasury notes falling due by March 13th, not yet redeemed - -	250,000
Treasury notes falling due in the rest of March, April and May, and others then redeemable - -	1,150,000
Ordinary expenditures in March, April and May, out of appropriations already made, and new ones which are expected to pass, and are required to carry into effect existing laws for ordinary objects, before 1st of June, estimated at - -	4,500,000
	$7,350,000
Least balance usually proper to have on hand at various points, near as well as remote - - -	$2,000,000
Add for the 1st of June, to meet what is immediately due under the many new appropriations passed near the close of the session - -	500,000
	$9,850,000
Deduct the computed means - -	5,100,000
Amount of additional means appearing expedient now and before the 1st of June - - -	$4,750,000

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia,

Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and be printed.

Mr. BELL rose and said that he felt a little embarrassed as to an application which had been made by friends around him. Some gentlemen were under the impression that this discussion would be continued from day to day, until the subject was disposed of; but he apprehended that, if not terminated this evening, it would go over to this day two weeks, unless a special order should be made in relation to it. Other gentlemen had expressed an anxiety to have an opportunity, during the remnant of the evening, of presenting petitions, which could only be done by an order to that effect, or by unanimous consent. And, again, other gentlemen had expressed their anxiety to have the question taken at some early day, and their fear that, if this evening was passed in discussion, no opportunity would be given to take the question. He was ready, in courtesy and in justice to the business of the House, to yield to any reasonable proposition which might be made. If it was the sense of the House that the question should be taken immediately, he would not occupy its time in any remarks, however desirous it might be to him to submit a few observations. Or, if it was the sense of the House to postpone the further consideration of the subject to a particular day, he would acquiesce. Whatever course the House might think proper to adopt, he should feel himself constrained, in courtesy, to accede to.

Mr. CASEY would make a suggestion. The original proposition as to the instructions was offered by himself. So far as he was concerned, he was willing to forego the desire he felt to address the House; and he believed that he might say for a number of the friends of the measure, that they were willing and anxious to take the question this evening. Other subjects would come up, on which gentlemen might have an opportunity to express their views on all the various matters which had been brought into this discussion; and, in order that the subject before the House might be referred to the committee, (if it was the pleasure of the House so to do,) and that the committee might act upon it, he hoped the question might be taken this evening.

Mr. BELL said he understood, then, that no gentleman wisked to speak.

Mr. RHETT begged to remind gentlemen of what they themselves had said, that it was their desire that the question should be discussed in all its bearings fully, and that after it had been discussed the question should be taken. He believed that three gentlemen had spoken against the appropriation, and that nine had spoken in favor of it.

Mr. BELL, after paying a high compliment to the peech of the eloquent gentleman [Mr. CORWIN] said that he should oppose this appropriation, as he always had opposed it, on the grounds of its inexpediency, and not on constitutional grounds, which, in his opinion, were untenable. He believed that appropriations for the Cumberland road were as much in accordance with the Constitution as those for harbors, light-houses, &c. on the sea coast, and therefore the most successful mode of attacking this measure would be on the grounds of its inexpediency, and not of its unconstitutionality. He thought that no sensible people would withhold their appropriations from the seaboard for the purpose of making these expenditures overflow on their borders—and he always thought that the people of the interior would never submit to such a construction of the Constitution as this. If it was true, as alleged by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] that such a crisis had arrived in our national affairs, that it was possible to bring back the Government to its original purity, he was willing to go along with him in cutting off these enormous appropriations not sanctioned by the spirit of the Constitution, and particularly with regard to those isolated appropriations for the benefit of particular sections of the country. He was willing to go along with the gentleman, and do all in his power to stay the tide of extravagance and profusion of expenditure that had, for some years past, been running so strongly. But was the gentleman sure that such a crisis had arrived? Was he not mistaken in his judgment? The gentleman did not dwell upon the evidence which was so satisfactory to his mind, that this happy state of things had arrived. He did not go into the details of that evidence to show that the Republican party of the South now occupied the vantage ground, which would enable them to control the action of this Government with regard to a more economical administration of its affairs. Allusion had been made, in the course of this debate, to the state of the Treasury, but this was an argument that had been used every year the Cumberland road was before the House, and was both idle and unprofitable. This Government had been frequently obliged to borrow money, and last year issued Treasury notes. It was not the state of the Treasury, then, that the gentleman from South Carolina relied on to defeat these appropriations. Was it in any change in the opinions of the Executive? and was the gentleman from New York right in supposing that the President had abandoned all his old opinions with regard to the importance of internal improvements, and had set his face against all such appropriations? There was no evidence of this nature before them. He was not aware that it had ever been customary for the President of the United States to notice these great works in his annual message to Congress; and therefore, there was nothing to warrant them in supposing that he was opposed to the Cumberland road, because it was not mentioned in his last message. It was supposed, however, by some, that the President had changed his views with regard to these great questions, because the Secretary of the Treasury had omitted to make an estimate for the Cumberland road, in his last annual report.

We are now, said Mr. B. on the eve of a Presidential election, and that is the cause why there is a more animated struggle upon the question of continuing these improvements. Mr. B. here referred to the Journal of the House for 1834, and quoted the proceedings on taking up the bill for the Cumberland road, in illustration of his argument; and then went on to allude to the effects to be produced on the South, if it could be satisfied that these appropriations would cease. After replying at some length to Mr. PICKENS, Mr. B. went into his objections to this resolution, and particularly objected to the various other appropriations that were tacked to it, in the way of amendments, thus compelling the House to express an opinion in relation to all of them together. He expressed his wish that some settled system of internal improvements should be adopted, by which a known and fixed amount should be appropriated every year, and by this means break up that system of combinations and alliances which had too often carried through the most objectionable appropriations. He blamed the members from the South for their unalterable and unqualified opposition to internal improvements in every shape, and believed that such opposition had caused the combinations of members from the Northeastern and Western States, which had enabled them to carry all their sectional objects through the House. He had no doubt but that millions might be saved to the South by their relaxing their system, and admitting of fixed and permanent appropriations for objects worthy of the national bounty. After continuing his remarks for some time, Mr. B. was interrupted by Mr. HUBBARD, who suggested to him, on account of the lateness of the hour, to give way for an adjournment.

Mr. BELL expressed his willingness to acquiesce in the decision of the House, reserving his right to the floor when the subject should be again resumed; after which, at the request of several gentlemen near him, he submitted a resolution, extending the time for the daily reception of petitions until the first of March next. This resolution requiring the general consent of the House,

Mr. TURNEY objected.

Mr. JONES of Virginia also objected on the ground of the motion interfering with the important public business which demanded the earliest consideration of the House.

Mr. BELL then moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to submit the resolution; and, in taking the question by tellers, there were 78 in the affirmative and 25 in the negative.

No quorum voting,

On motion of Mr. RHETT,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, February 18, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a resolution of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa, praying the passage of a law to authorize the election of the Governor of that Territory by the people, after the term of the present incumbent shall have expired; which was referred to the Committe on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINN presented the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Wisconsin, praying the confirmation of the claims of Francis Laventure; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. L. also presented the copy of a correspondence in relation to the confirmation by the British Government of a grant of land to Jonathan Carver, by the Nodoweisa Indians, in the year 1767; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. LUMPKIN presented the petition of a number of citizens of Paulding county, in the State of Georgia, praying the establishment of a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. YOUNG submitted an additional document in relation to the memorial of the Mayor and Common Council of the city of Chicago; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of a number of citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, praying an increase of the duty on foreign silks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STURGEON presented three petitions from citizens of Washington county, Pennsylvania, praying the abolition of the slave trade; the motion to receive which, was,

On motion by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. STURGEON presented eleven memorials against the use of bloodhounds in the Florida war; which were laid on the table.

Mr. S. also presented the remonstrance of a number of citizens of Washington county, Pennsylvania, against the admission of Texas into the Union; which,

On motion by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, was laid on the table.

On motion by Mr. ALLEN; the petition of William Walker, now on file, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred

The petition of the legal representatives of John G. Mackall;

The petition of Abraham Williamson; and made adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

The memorial of Fleming Wood;

Mr. H. from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of James B. Morgan; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Daniel B. Bush, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of John W. Monette; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CLAY of Ala. from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to grant other lands to the inhabitants of townships deprived of the sixteenth sections by Indian reservations; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. STURGEON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the petition of the heirs of James Caldwell, made an unfavorable report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred

The petition of Gilbert Walker and N. B. Hill

The petition of Thomas L. Bone; and made adverse reports, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. M. from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Adam D. Stewart; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. NORVELL, the documents in relation to the claim of Charles McKenzie for a half-quarter section of land, were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the following bill; which was ordered to a second reading:

AN ACT to equalize the pay and allowances of the officers of the line and staff of the army.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the first day of the month next ensuing after the passing of this act, the colonels, lieutenant colonels, and majors, of the Corps of Engineers, the Corps of Topographical Engineers, the Corps of Ordnance, the Quarmaster's Department, and the Subsistence Department, be entitled to receive forage, or money in lieu thereof, when forage is not furnished in kind, for the same number of horses only now allowed to officers of corresponding grades of the artillery and infantry of the army.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the first day of the month next ensuing the passage of this act, the captains in the staff, corps, and departments mentioned in the preceding section, be allowed forage, or money in lieu thereof, when forage is not furnished in kind, for two horses, and that the first and second lieutenants of the aforesaid corps and departments, after the same day, be no longer entitled to forage or money in lieu thereof: Provided, nevertheless, That whenever the duties of said lieutenants shall require them to be mounted, they shall be furnished with two horses each, at the expense of the United States, and forage for the same.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted. That from and after the first day of the month next ensuing after the passing of this act, the colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains of the artillery and infantry of the army, be entitled to receive the same monthly pay as is now allowed by law to cavalry officers of similar and corresponding grades; and that the first and second lieutenants of the several corps and departments enumerated in the first section of this act, and also the first and second lieutenants of the artillery and infantry of the army, be entitled to receive, each, the monthly pay of thirty-two dollars and twenty-six dollars respectively.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. P. said that it would not be proper for him, in the present stage of the bill, to enter upon a particular explanation of its details; but he would take leave to remark generally, that it would make but a very trifling increase of the annual expense of our whole military establishment. It contemplates, on the one hand, a reduction of the forage ration, and, on the other, an increase of the monthly pay—and this was the main principle upon which the equalization proposed to affected was based. He believed there was no provision in the bill which the committee would not be prepared to vindicate, upon the ground of justice to those immediately interested, and from considerations of public policy. If he was not greatly mistaken with regard to the feeling which at present exists among the officers of the line of the army stationed in Florida, along the frontier, every where, sufficiently indicated, by the mass of memorials which had been presented at this and the two preceding sessions, and if he did not greatly mistake public sentiment upon this subject, the legislation proposed should be regarded as not less desirable to the staff than to the line. He hoped the bill would attract the attention of every Senator, and finally receive the approbation of all—because he anticipated from its passage the happiest results to every branch of the service.

The adverse reports from the various committees on the Secretary's table were taken up, considered, and agreed to. [Among these reports, was one from the Judiciary Committee, on the prayer of a number of citizens of New Orleans, praying an alteration of the naturalization laws, which was, that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.]

The bill for the relief of John H. Shepard, administrator of Abiel Wood, was taken up on its third reading, read a third time, and passed.

SPECIAL ORDER.

The resolutions of the Select Committee on the assumption of the State debts, and the substitute submitted by Mr. CRITTENDEN, and the amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN, were taken up.

Mr. NORVELL offered the following as a substitute for Mr. BUCHANAN's amendment:

Resolved, That while the Senate of the United States is fully impressed with the importance and correctness of the principles contained in the foregoing resolutions, it is not intended thereby to create any doubt of the constitutional right of the States to contract debts, nor of their resources, disposition, or ability to fulfil the engagements which they have contracted, for purposes of internal improvement, as well as for other objects within the range of their reserved powers.

Mr. PHELPS, who was entitled to the floor on this subject, not being present, Mr. HUBBARD said that, though he would have greatly preferred to have followed Mr. P. he did not wish the subject to be farther delayed; and would, therefore, with the leave of the Senate, proceed to submit the few remarks he intended to offer on this subject.

Mr. HUBBARD then proceeded at great length in favor of the resolutions reported by the Select Committee, and at the conclusion of his remarks,

On motion by Mr. CLAY of Kentucky,

The Senate adjourned.

MR. EDITOR: The report in the Globe of the 13th instant, of my remarks, made in response to a question of Mr. PROFFIT, put to him in the course of his speech, is inaccurate in two points:

1st. In my description of the modern Whig party.

2d. In my remarks connected with the name of Mr. CLAY.

I said: "I did not belong to the Whig party; that the same was not to my taste; that as I understood the matter, it was composed of the ancient Federal party, the fragments of obsolete and evanescent parties, the vanguards of nascent parties, struggling for existence, and a few Democrats, who, from personal predilections, suffer themselves to act with them to whom they do not belong."

I am reported in the Globe as having said, that from the time when I was on the CLAY electoral ticket in Indiana, he [Mr. CLAY] had "repudiated his old Democratic principles."

I did not say this. I am not here to discuss, or criticise, the political character or course of Mr. CLAY or any other gentleman, not now before the country. What I did say was this, viz: "That at the time when I was on the Clay electoral ticket in Indiana, Mr. Clay's orthodoxy as a Democratic politician had never been doubted."

Very respectfully,
W. W. WICK.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Feb. 17, 1840.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, February 18, 1840.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana asked permission of the House to offer a resolution to extend the time for the reception of petitions. He had no design that it should interfere with the special order of the House: His object was to bring the House to some decision on the question which had been under discussion for several days past, growing out of the petition presented by him in relation to the Cumberland road. It was important to that interest that the time should be extended, to enable the discussion to proceed, and bring the House to a proper decision thereon.

Mr. JONES of Virginia was understood to say that the Committee of Ways and Means had before it a subject of the greatest importance, upon which they would report a bill on to-morrow; and it would then be indispensable that it should be acted on without delay. It was in fact necessary to do so to furnish means to carry on the operations of Government. He was apprehensive, if the resolution proposed should be adopted, that it would interfere with the action on that bill, as well as others of equal importance now on the SPEAKER's table.

Mr. DAVIS then offered his resolution, which was read for the information of the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the time for the presentation of petitions be extended and continued until the 1st day of March.

Objection was made to its reception; when

Mr. DAVIS moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved a call of the House: not ordered.

The question was then taken on a suspension of the rules, and determined in the negative—yeas 91, nays 56.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections by Mr. CAMPBELL, chairman, asking the House to grant that committee the privilege to have all printing done which it deemed necessary to facilitate the investigation of the New Jersey disputed election.

The question pending when the resolution was last under consideration, was the motion of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON to amend the proposition from the committee, by authorizing that committee to have printed all the evidence they had collected in relation to this election.

Mr. CAMPBELL said he had been instructed by the committee to accept the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. W. JOHNSON.]

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON then offered the following resolution as a substitute for his former proposition:

Resolved, That all the proceedings and papers before the Committee of Elections in relation to the New Jersey election, be reported to the House by the committee, with a statement of the names of the individuals who received a majority of all the votes given at the election for members of the 26th Congress in that State, and that the same be printed for the use of the House, and the committee have leave to have such other papers and documents in relation to other contested elections, pending before them, printed by the public Printer of Congress.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, chairman of the Committee of Elections, then addressed the House until the expiration of the morning hour, in explanation of the course which had been taken by the committee in reference to this question; which will be published at length hereafter.

Mr. JONES of Virginia called for the special order of the day; and in execution of which, on his motion,

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. LINCOLN in the Chair, and took up the bill making appropriations for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1840.

The questions immediately pending in committee, when it last rose, were, the amendment to the bill submitted by Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, as follows:

"Be it further enacted, That no money appropriated by this act shall be placed in the hands of pension agents more than one month before the day for the semi-annual payment of pensions;"

And the amendment of Mr. UNDERWOOD to the same, as follows:

"Each pension agent shall be allowed as compensation for his services —— per cent. on the amount of money disbursed by him: Provided, That no pension agent shall receive as compensation more than 1,500 dollars per annum.

"Be it further enacted, That it shall be unlawful for any pension agent to use or apply to his own purposes, or to lend to any person or persons, or to suffer any person or persons to use, any part of the public moneys placed in his hands or subject to his control; and, if any pension agent shall violate the foregoing provisions of this section, he shall, upon conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction, undergo and suffer imprisonment for a period of time not less than one nor more than five years, at the discretion of the jury convicting the offender."

A long debate here arose, as to the propriety of making the appropriation contained in the bill at that time, and as to the expediency of changing the mode of compensating the pension agents, in which Messrs. WHITE of Kentucky, JONES of Virginia, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, TILLINGHAST, R. GARLAND, TRIPLETT, WISE, and EVANS, participated, (which will be given hereafter,) when

The question was taken on Mr. UNDERWOOD's amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, another debate arose as to the propriety of its adoption, and whether it would not be better to pass a bill at that time, making a transfer of the unexpended balances from one head of appropriation, to be applied to others on which it was needed, to meet the pensions becoming due in March, and to pass a subsequent bill appropriating a sufficient sum to meet those falling due in September. Messrs. CURTIS, EVANS, JONES of Virginia, BELL, WHITE, and POPE, took part, when

Mr. WHITE moved to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, for the purpose of inserting the following:

"That the Secretary of War, with the approbation of the President of the United States, be, and he is hereby authorized, to transfer the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made to the different classes of the general pension fund, to any of those classes to which the specific appropriation may be deficient, for the purpose of meeting the various claims upon any of the classes of the said general pension fund."

Mr. BANKS said it would be in order to move the above as an amendment to the amendment, but was clearly out of order to move it as a substitute for the bill, while the amendment previously offered was pending.

The CHAIR, accordingly, ruled the amendment out of order; when

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. GARLAND of La. and decided in the negative.

Mr. WHITE renewed his amendment, as above.

The question on which was taken by tellers, (Messrs. DAVIES of Pa. and GRAVES acting as such,) and the amendment was rejected—ayes 52, noes 75.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Va. the committee then rose and reported the bill to the House, without amendment.

Mr. CURTIS moved that the House adjourn; and the yeas and nays having been ordered upon the said motion, he withdrew it.

Mr. TURNEY demanded the previous question.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS moved that the House adjourn; upon which

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 22, nays 116.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered; which main question was, Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON demanded the yeas and nays on the above question; which were ordered, and were—yeas 135, nays none.

The bill was then read a third time, when

On the motion of Mr. TURNEY, the previous question was moved and seconded, and the main question was ordered; which main question was, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was then passed; after which,

On motion of Mr. DROMGOOLE,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, February 19, 1840.

Mr. ALLEN presented the petition of E Shaler; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of citizens of Maine, for a Congress of Nations, to settle internat onal disputes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion by Mr. YOUNG, the petition of a numer of citizens of Illinois, praying that an annual term of the Circuit and District Court of Illinois may be held at Chicago, now on file, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SALT DUTY AND SALT MONOPOLY IN THE WEST.

Mr. BENTON asked to add certain papers to those already ordered to be printed on the subject of the salt duty, and the monopoly of salt in the West. The papers which had been ordered to be printed were principally from the West—chiefly from the State of Missouri: those which he now presented, came from a very different quarter; they came from the East—and from the far East—from that Asia which groaned under the iron sceptre of the English East India Company. This company, which was a corporation, had exemplified in Asia every variety of abuse, tyranny, and oppression, which the passions of man could suggest; and among other abuses, had established a salt momonopoly throughout the vast regions over which it ruled. The parallel between the conduct of these monopol zers of salt in Asia and in America was complete in every particular; in selling by the pound, instead of the measured bushel; in extorting an enormous and unconscionable price; in appointing agents to distribute the salt to the people in districts; in adulterating the salt; and in suppressing its manufacture, or production. In all these particulars, the conduct of the monopolizers in Asia and America was precisely the same; and there was but one point at which the Engl sh company beat the American; and that was in the reduction of the qsantity, or suppression of the manufacture of salt. The American companies effected their object by renting salt wells and furnaces, and letting them lie idle, and by hiring owners of salt water not to dig wells; and also by limiting the manufacturers to make but a certain quantity. This is the way the American monopolizers effected their object; the English company in India, on account of their military force, had a more compendious, cheaper, and effectual way to accomplish the same object: it was, simply, to drive the native Hindoos down to the sea shore, where the power of the sun covered the beach with pure strong salt, from the evaporation of sea water, and make them throw it all back into the sea; and then come to the Company's agents and purchase their adulterated stuff, (from one-third to one-half being the amount of adulteration,) at the rate of about fifty cents for fifteen pounds. With this single exception, in which the English monopolizers in Asia had the advantage over the Americans in the mode of lessening the quantity of salt, their conduct was precisely the same, and led to the same complaints and applications for redress. The Hindoos, in 1832, sent a deputation to London to complain to the Parliament of this salt monopoly, and its heartless abuses. The House of Commons raised a select committee to inquire into the conduct of the East India Company generally, and into this abuse in particular; which committee took the testimony, both of natives and Englishmen, and reported the whole to Parliament; and here it is, said Mr. B. (holding up a large folio volume;) here it is; and I now have to ask the Senate to print, as a part of the salt papers already ordered to be printed, the testimory of two of these witnesses examined before the select committee of the British House of Commons; one of the witnesses being a native Hindoo, and the other an Englishman.

Mr. B. said he proposed to himself three advantages in printing the testimony of these two witnesses; first, to show the identity of abuse from the salt monop ly in Asia and in our America; secondly, to show that the people of the West now suffer from the salt monopolizers in the West, every oppress on which the English East India Company lately inflicted on the Hindoos; thirdly, to claim for the people of the West the same attention from Congress to their complaints against the salt monopoly, which the Hindoos obtained from the British Parliament.

Mr. B's motion was agreed to.

Mr. B. said that this examination into the salt monopoly in India, had been brought to his attention by a friend, in consequence of the five hours' debate in the Senate, on Friday last, against printing the testimony of Western citizens on the subject of the salt monopoly in the West.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the petition of the heirs of Silence Elliott, made an unfavorable report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Lieut. John E Bispham, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to use chemical or any other oil in the lighthouses, and to make the necessary alterations for that purpose; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill to authorize the Mine a Lamotte and Mississippi Railroad Company to enter, on a credit, a quantity of land, to aid the company in the construction of a railroad from Mine a Lamotte, in the State of Missouri, to the Mississippi river, and for other purposes; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the petition of the assignee of David Beard, made an unfavorable report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

The bill from the House of Representatives making appropriations for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1840, was read a first and second time, the referred to the Committee on Finance.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The bill for the relief of Charles Morgan of Louisiana;

The bill for the relief of Joseph Cochran;

The bill for the relief of Alvarez Fisk and the legal representatives of Thomas P. Eskridge;

The bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of William Conway;

The bill for the relief of Pierre Babin;

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Madame De Lusser;

The bill for the relief of Joseph Campan;

The bill to confirm certain land claims in the Greensburg land district, State of Louisiana; were severally taken up, as in Committee of the Whole, considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SPECIAL ORDER.

The resolution from the Select Committee on the assumption of the debts of the States was then taken up, and Mr. CLAY of Kentucky addressed the Senate at length on the subject.

Mr. SEVIER intimated an intention of addressing the Senate on the subject, and, on his motion,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, February 19, 1840.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Post Office Department, enclosing a report of the expenditures of that Department for the year ending 30th June, 1839, which was,

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, referred to the Committee on the Expenditures in the Post Office Department.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections by Mr. CAMPBELL, chairman, asking the House to grant that committee the privilege to have all printing done which is deemed necessary to facilitate the investigation of the New Jersey disputed election.

The question pending when the resolution was last under consideration, was the motion of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON to amend the proposition with the following, as a substitute:

Resolved, That all the proceedings and papers before the Committee of Elections in relation to the New Jersey election, be reported to the House by the committee, with a statement of the names of the individuals who received a majority of all the votes given at the election for members of the 26th Congress in that State, and that the same be printed for the use of the House, and the committee have leave to have such other papers and documents in relation to other contested elections, pending before them, printed by the public Printer of Congress.

Mr. FILLMORE, who was entitled to the floor on this proposition, was proceeding to discuss the proceedings of the committee, when he was interrupted by

Mr. PETRIKIN, who made the following point of order. It was not in order for the chairman of a committee, or any other member of a committee, or of the House, to allude upon that floor to any thing which has taken place in committee, or in any way relate, in debate, what was done by said committee, or by the individual members of the committee, except it is done by a counter report made to the House by authority of a majority of the committee.

The CHAIR decided that it was not in order for the gentleman from New York to allude to the proceedings of the committee.

Mr. FILLMORE. Is it not in order to answer the arguments already made on the actions of the committee, and to notice, in reply, the insinuations against the committee?

The CHAIR was understood to say that it would not be out of order to refer to the situation of the business before the committee, but it would be entirely out of order to discuss or refer to particular votes of any member in the committee.

Mr. FILLMORE said he had no desire to refer to the votes of the members of the committee. The journal of the committee would show that when it was published. In reference to the question, he would say that he was not surprised at any proposition that might be made to that House, and he might say surprised at any action of that House, if it would not be out of order to do so. In justification of the committee, he would say, that not one member of it anticipated that such a motion as this would have been made. He could not, however, believe that if the honorable gentleman who made the proposition knew the condition of the business of the committee, he could have been induced to make such a motion. He thought his ignorance of its situation was the only apology that gentleman could make for the singular course he had thought proper to take. Mr. F. then referred to the history of the New Jersey question when it was before the House, and before it was referred to the committee; and from a relation of that history, he inquired whether it was the intention of the House for that committee to make a preliminary report. He inferred from the action of the House, that it had already sanctioned the proceeding that there should be no report as to which of the parties had the legal returns, and read the resolution referring the subject, in proof of that fact. That resolution directed the committee to inquire and report, not as to the return, but who were entitled to the seats. The committee met, and had been in session almost every day since, from seven to ten hours per day, doing every thing in its power to enable it to place the subject in proper order before the House. The question had come up in the committee, whether they should make a prelimanary report first, as to who was entitled on the return to a seat on that floor, before the committee proceeded to investigate, to ascertain who was elected, or legally entitled to seats. After some discussion, the committee could not agree to any preliminary report, but agreed to go into a full investigation of the election itself.

The CHAIR here interfered, and said that it was not in order to discuss the proceedings of the committee.

Mr. F. then went on to show what the powers of the House were over the subject, under the Constitution, and how much of that power had been transferred to the committee. He was understood to say that the powers over the question were entirely of a judicial, and not of a legislative character; and consequently the committee for the House were not allowed to exercise any discretion, but were bound to go into the investigation after the manner of investigations before courts, and to be governed by the laws and the Constitution, to the same extent as the courts. The powers of the House to judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its members, were entirely distinct and independent of each other, and could not be confounded, unless the Constitution was entirely blotted out. The House had itself raised no question as to the qualification of the contestants; from that he argued that the questions of election and returns alone were referred to the committee. Mr. F. referred to the British practice, and to historical facts, to show what it was that constituted a return. It had a definite meaning; and, according to British practice, was the official result of the election, certified by the sheriffs, and held under a writ issued from the court of chancery to said sheriff, and this return of the sheriff was the prima facie evidence of election. It had been left by the Constitution of the United States for the States to prescribe the mode of return for members of Congress; and it was not the mere giving of votes, or certifying to the votes, that constituted a return, but the legal forms which the States had adopted as evidence of return. He contended that there was no intermediate point between the election and the return, and that they must be judged of distinctly and separately; and inasmuch as the House had set aside the return, it would be doing great injustice to the committee, to pass this resolution to compel it to make a report upon the return. He thought the rejection of the return by the House was sufficient authority for the committee to act upon it or to thrust it again before the House. He denounced the course the House had pursued in relation to the return of the State of New Jersey; which, he said, had been trampled under foot, because evidence had been presented to it which went to question the return, and which caused its rejection, and yet was deemed sufficient to give the opposite party a title to the seats. The evidence was merely sufficient to create a vacuum. After a discussion in committee for several days, (in view of the rejection of the returns by the House, and its having raised no question as to qualification,) it determined to go into an investigation of the election, the only question before it; that is, to ascertain who were elected, or had the majority of legal votes. The committee had taken up the evidence before it to ascertain its competence—and it had decided that some portion of the testimony was incompetent, because sufficient time had not been given to the opposite party to be present when it was taken. In consequence of this, further time was asked by the parties to take testimony.

Objection was here interposed to prevent the gentleman from arraigning the proceedings of the committee before the House.

Mr. SMITH of Maine hoped the gentleman would be permitted to proceed. He was willing, and the Democrats were willing, that he should go on. He was bound to believe that that the question was safe in the hands of the Democratic portion of that committee.

Mr. FILLMORE resumed, and was proceeding to show, from the condition of the subject before the committee, that it could not report; and was in the act of reading a resolution adopted by the committee, in which it had determined, with a view of giving time to the contestants to take testimony, that it would not make a report before the second Monday of April next; when

Mr. PETRIKIN again interposed a point of order, whether it was proper for the gentleman to read to the House a resolution, adopted in the committee, which had not been reported.

The CHAIR said it was not in order to do so; but if the House thought proper to permit it, he could have no objection.

Mr. RIVES hoped the gentleman would be allowed to proceed until a full investigation was gone through with, and that the House would do no other business until it was settled as to who were entitled to seats from New Jersey.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina was surprised that any gentleman who wished to see New Jersey fully represented in the House, should be in favor of this mode of discussion. If permitted to go on in this way, it would consume the whole session to no purpose.

Mr. HAND of New York moved that his colleague be allowed to proceed.

The SPEAKER stated the question to the House, when

Mr. PETRIKIN asked if a majority could give permission to the gentleman to go on out of order?

The SPEAKER said he could only put the question to the House on the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAND.] If the House permitted the gentleman to proceed, it would then be for it to determine whether he proceeded in order or not.

Mr. PETRIKIN said it required a vote of two-thirds to authorize a gentleman to discuss a subject not in order. A majority could not dispense with the standing orders of the House, and had no right to allow a member to go on out of order. When a gentleman was called to order for discussing a matter not before the House, and the CHAIR decided that he was out of order, he might get the leave of the House to go on with his remarks in order, but not out of order. Where would the evil stop if a bare majority could permit a gentleman to consume the time of the House by discussion out of order? The business of the country could never be got through with if this practice was permitted. He made these objections (Mr. P. said) not on account of any personal or party considerations, but solely for the purpose of bringing back the House to that regularity and order of proceeding so essential to all legislative bodies, and from which there had been a lamentable departure for almost the whole of this session. Who would be a member of a committee (Mr. P. asked) if all its proceedings were to be commented on in that House before it had made any report?

Mr. FILLMORE said he had nearly finished reading the resolution when he was interrupted. He wished to read it for the purpose of showing to the House how impossible it was for the committee to make a report as required by the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee. If the CHAIR decided that it was not in order for him to read that paper, he must acquiesce in the decision; but, on his part, he thought that he was in order.

The SPEAKER asked the gentleman if he wished to appeal from the decision of the CHAIR; and suggested to him that he had better take that course, or accomplish his object in another way, by moving for permission of the House to read the paper.

Mr. FILLMORE then moved that he be permitted to read such portions of the proceedings of the committee as the amendment proposed to have printed.

Mr. PETRIKIN called for tellers on the motion, which were not ordered, and the question was taken by count, resulting—ayes 95, noes not counted.

Mr. DUNCAN then rose and demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; when

Mr. BRIGGS asked if it was not in order for the gentleman to read a paper on which there was a question before the House, whether it should be printed.

The SPEAKER replied that the gentleman from New York had no right to read papers containing the proceedings of the committee, (not reported by it,) although the amendment under discussion proposed to print those proceedings.

Mr. ADAMS. If the SPEAKER decides that papers, which a motion is made to print, shall not be read, I appeal from that decision.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina asked if it was not out of order to print papers which had not been reported to the House by the committee.

The SPEAKER said that was a question for the House to decide.

Mr. STANLY called for the reading of all the papers which the amendment contemplated printing.

The SPEAKER said the papers were not in possession of the House.

Mr. STANLY. Then you are going to print papers which are not in possession of the House.

Mr. RIVES explained that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee was, that the committee be required to report to the House, and that then the papers, after they came into the possession of the House, should be printed. He would second the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina to have the papers brought before the House, and then have them printed forthwith.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut argued that it would be a censure on the committee to pass this resolution, and do great injustice to it, if the members were not permitted to place themselves right before the House and the country. The committee was not prepared to report, notwithstanding it had been very industrious in investigating the subjects before it. If the House passed this resolution, it would be an invasion of the rights of the committee, and would be assailing it, and unjustly arraign it before the nation. He considered the proceeding a most novel one. But if the House was determined to take action upon it, he thought it due that the members of the committee should be permitted to show the condition of the business a a reason why it would be impossible to make a report for a month. The committee was now trying the contested election from Pennsylvania, which alone would occupy a month.

Mr. S. spoke at some length in vindication of the rights of the committee, and to show the great impropriety of adopting the resolution.

The discussion of the subject was here arrested, the morning hour having expired, by Mr. PETRIKIN, who called for the orders of the day.

Mr. JOHNSON of Tennessee asked if it would not be in order to move to proceed with the business now before them.

The CHAIR said it would not, without a suspension of the rules.

Mr. RIVES said, for the purpose of making the motion in relation to that matter, and to enable the House to decide a great question involving the rights of members to seats, and for the purpose of having speedy action thereon, he moved a suspension of the rules; and on that question demanded the yeas and nays.

The CHAIR said the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PETRIKIN,] had precedence. It would be for a majority of the House to decide whether it would go on with the orders or not. If the majority preferred continuing the consideration of the New Jersey case, it could show that preference by voting down the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RIVES. For the purpose of ascertaining the decision of the House in reference to a continuation of the New Jersey case, I move that the question on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be taken by yeas and nays. Then all who desire to see the State of New Jersey fully represented on this floor would vote against the motion to proceed to the orders of the day.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I tell the gentleman that the true members of New Jersey have gone home.

The yeas and nays having been ordered on a suspension of the rules, were—yeas 97, nays 92.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Biddle, Black, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Corwin, Crockett, Cross, Curtis, Cushing, Davies, John W. Williams, and Henry Williams—92.

There not being two-thirds, the rules were not suspended, and the House proceeded to the orders of the day.

Mr. J. W. JONES, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, by permission, reported the following bill:

A BILL additional to the act on the subject of Treasury notes.

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the regulations and provisions contained in the act passed the twelfth day of October, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," and in the subsequent acts in addition thereto, be, and the same are hereby, renewed, and made in full force, excepting the limitations concerning the times within which such notes may be issued, and restricting the amount thereof as hereafter provided.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That under the regulations and provisions contained in said act, Treasury notes may be issued in lieu of others hereafter or heretofore redeemed, but not to exceed in the amount of notes outstanding at any one time, the aggregate of five millions of dollars, and to be redeemed sooner than one year, if the means of the Treasury will permit by giving notice sixty days, of those notes which the Department is ready to redeem: no interest to be allowed thereon after the expiration of said sixty days.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force one year, and no longer.

The bill having been twice read, was,

On motion of Mr. JONES, referred to the Committee of the whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. J. W. JONES said he had been directed by the Committee of Ways and Means to ask that the bill be made the special order of the day for to-morrow week, and that it be proceeded with until disposed of. [Cries of "No," "No," from several.] Mr. J. said, after the communication from the President of the United States, presented to the House on yesterday, it could not be necessary for him to state any thing in reference to the importance of immediate action on that bill. The propriety of the motion he was about to submit would be apparent to every one.

Mr. R. GARLAND objected to the motion, and called Mr. J. to order.

Mr. JONES then moved to suspend the rules, for the purpose of introducing his motion.

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules; which were ordered.

Mr. BIDDLE appealed to the candor of the gentleman from Virginia, whether it would be fair in him to deprive him of the floor, by pressing the motion, after he had, through courtesy, yielded it.

Mr. JONES would readily answer that he was certainly indebted to the courtesy of the gentleman for an opportunity to offer his resolution; and if he had supposed for a moment that he interfered, in the slightest degree, with the course the gentleman had marked out for himself, he would not press his motion. As it was, if the gentleman considered the resolution in that light he would withdraw it.

Mr. BIDDLE thought it would be an invasion of his right to the floor. The gentleman could have some other opportunity of submitting his motion.

Mr. JONES then withdrew his motion.

The SPEAKER then announced that the business before the House was the bill making appropriation to complete the removal of the raft of the Red river, and for other purposes, on which was pending the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvana [Mr. BIDDLE] to refer the same to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to inquire and report to the House as follows:

1. Whether the advance of money by the Bank of Arkansas, which it is one of the objects of this bill to reimburse, was not made with full knowledge that the agent of the United States who effected the loan was acting in defiance of positive instructions from his superiors, as well as in the face of a known refusal by Congress to appropriate money to the work.

2. Whether the estimate on which the bill is founded was not made by the said agent prior to the closing up of the raft in August last; and whether any satisfactory data exist for computing the probable cost of removing the present impediments to navigation.

3. Whether the sum appropriated by this bill is called for in the estimates accompanying the President's message.

4. Whether the bill is not of such a character that it ought to have originated in this House.

Mr. BIDDLE, who was entitled to the floor, commenced by saying that his honorable friend from Virginia [Mr. JONES] would readily understand why he was so reluctant to grant him the indulgence he asked. The gentleman was aware that his (Mr. B's) motion had arrested the bill that was now before the House, when it first came from the Senate; that many gentlemen around him, and particularly his friend from Louisiana [Mr. R. GARLAND] took the deepest interest in its passage, and therefore it was somewhat incumbent in him to press its consideration at this time. When this bill was before the House on a former occasion, he was one of those who protested against any action on it, or a reference of it to a committee, who, it seemed, were expected to report on it without examination or critisism. It did not then occur to him that this bill had a connection with a passage found in the documents accompanying the President's message, which struck his attention at the time he read them. He should ask the attention of the House to the bill in connection with those documents, and if any gentleman had that mass of documents before him, he would be gratified if he would turn to them, and accompany him by references to them in the course of his remarks he should now make. Mr. B. then referred to a communication from the Superintendent to the War Department, dated at St. Louis, 12th June, 1839, in which he stated the circumstances under which he had opened a communication with the planters on the Red river, which resulted in obtaining a loan for carrying on the work.

Mr. B. also referred to several other documents having a relation to the subject, and then proceeded to comment with much severity on the proceedings of the superintendent, and the sanction which he alleged was given to them by the War Department. In making an estimate for an appropriation to cover the amount which the superintendent had expended in this way, Mr. B. contended that the Department held out a temptation to extravagance and abuse of trust on the part of its subordinates. This estimate, he said, was drawn up in compliance with the pledge made by the superintendent to the Bank of Arkansas. There was no other estimate. The bill adopted it, and took it up in presence of this pledge to that bank. Now the very first item in that estimate was for the reimbursement of the money which was thus obtained and expended by the superintendent, with the full knowledge that it was done in violation of his orders. Mr. B. then went on to contend that they had no information with regard to the present condition of the work, or what was necessary to be done on it, and that the superintendent had not visited it at the time he made his last communication to the Department.

Mr. CROSS of Arkansas followed in reply to Mr. BIDDLE, and described the situation of the Red River, and the condition of the county, and how far it would destroy private interests there, as well as the interests of the Government, to discontinue the appropriations for removing the obstructions to this river. A large portion of the lands redeemed belong to the Government; and a great quantity had already been sold, and had brought into the public Treasury about one and a half millions of dollars. It would be most unjust to the purchasers to discontinue the improvements in that river, when the land was purchased under the impression that the Government would complete what it had already begun; in fact, it would result in a total loss to the most of them. Without removing the obstructions, it would be impossible to protect the inhabitants of that county against the Indians, if they should undertake to wage war against them. It was also most important for the prosecution of trade, to remove the obstructions.

The raft itself was composed of accumulations of floating timber, choking up the channel of the river, and could not be passed nor repassed. This, at one period of time, extended up and down the river for a distance of 150 miles; but the superintendent, under whose charge the work has been carried on for several years past, had removed the whole of these obstructions, though not effectually. The channel was yet too narrow, and, at the bends of the river, the floating timber coming down had lodged, and thus commenced the forming of new rafts that formed last year, extending something like one mile; but, at the present time, to about four or five miles. This was continually increasing, and unless the work was speedily commenced, would grow to such an extent as to make the cost of removal very considerable. If the Government designed to prosecute this work, and keep pace with the extensive settlements on the river above the raft, the appropriation ought to be speedily made. If not, they had better abandon the work at once, and let those interested in it know what they had to expect. He was very sure that neither the superintendent, nor the War Department, nor any one connected with it, were entitled to the censures cast on them by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman was mistaken in one point. The advance was made by the planters interested in the navigation of the river, and not by the Bank of Arkansas; and the superintendent said expressly to them, that he was unwilling to incur any liability, and that he could not pledge them the faith of Congress for the redemption of this money; that if they advanced it, they must do so; they must look to Congress for reimbursement. The citizens of Arkansas, therefore, made the advance on their own responsibility, and they did it upon a conviction that the Government would not abandon a work of so much importance to them as well as to the United States. Mr. C. said that the superintendent having a perfect knowledge of the character of the work on which he had been engaged for so many years, and having been there last year, it did not occur to him that it was necessary for him to visit it at the time he made his last communication to the Department. This objection, therefore, of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, was satisfactorily, he hoped, answered. Mr. C. said he disclaimed the idea of resting the success of this appropriation on Executive favor. He rested it on the importance of the work as well to the interests of the citizens of Arkansas as to those of the Government. If the appropriation was not justly due to the people of that section of country—if Congress did not consult the interests of the Government in making it, let the work be abandoned. But he took the ground that the implied faith of the Government was pledged to those citizens, who had paid millions into the Treasury for the purchase of lands on that river, under an expectation that the work would go on—and, further, that the Government would derive more advantage from the appropriation than the settlers themselves. In addition to this, it must be remarked, that the free navigation of that river was essential to the defence of the people of Arkansas from the Indians, placed by the Government on their borders. He should suppose that there was no question of the power of the Senate to make this appropriation, as assumed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It was not a new appropriation, but a continuation of a work that had been carried on for years; and though it was conceded that the Senate had no right to originate appropriation bills, yet he apprehended that that objection could not be made to their originating a bill to continue a work already commenced, and in progress. Mr. C. said he was not now inclined to enter into the merits of the bill; he would prefer doing so when it came up regularly before the House. He had shown in a desultory and unconnected manner the evils that would ensue from putting a stop to this work; and he would further add, that the improvements made in the river had not only increased the sales of the public lands in its vicinity to an unexampled degree, but had saved the Government upwards of $40,000 in the transportation of its stores and munitions of war to the forts in the Indian country.

Mr. R. GARLAND said he regretted that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDDLE] had thought proper to make some of the remarks which he did, and he hoped that he would permit the reference to be made without the instructions. The information which he wished to elicit by them was to be found in the documents; and whatever of it that could not be found there would, he believed, be deemed not of much importance. Mr. G. then quoted the resolution of Mr. BIDDLE, and went on to show that the agent himself had stated all the information on facts there required. Under the well-grounded impressions that the Department had the right to entertain the opinion that Congress would continue the appropriations for works on which it had already appropriated some hundred thousands of dollars; and, considering the great distance from the seat of Government, and that they had not time to make known the failure of the appropriation of last year, he thought the superintendent had acted very properly in continuing the work by the means he had resorted to. Considering the great importance of this improvement to the people of that section of country, and that by means of a formation of the raft they would be cut off from market, they were justified in making this advance, with the hope that Congress would continue the appropriation. But when they were informed that Congress had failed to do so, the agent had overrun the amount in his hands, $4,000; and he informed the people distinctly that he would not pledge the faith of Congress, but if they thought proper to make advances, he would use his influence to procure an appropriation to indemnify them. There was no allegation that this money had been misplaced or not used advantageously; on the contrary, it must be admitted that the conduct of the agent was judicious and praiseworthy. It seemed a curious way to punish one of the officers of the Government to put a stop to a work which had been going on for years. It would be better to reach that officer in some other way. When the gentleman looked further into this matter, he would find that the superintendent had adhered to the strict letter of his instructions, and had done nothing censurable. All the information that the committee could possibly give the gentleman from Pennsylvania was already in the documents, and it was just as easy for him to read it there as when it was sent back from the committee. Mr. G. went on to show the advantages which the Government derived from this improvement. The money expended there had been returned fivefold from the sales of the lands reclaimed. He also referred to the immense saving to the Government in transportation of supplies to the forts above, which, as the documents would show, was upwards of $40,000.

On motion of Mr. BEATTY,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, February 20, 1840.

Mr. YOUNG presented the petition of a number of citizens of McDonough county, Illinois, praying the establishment of a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of a number of the citizens of the State of New York, praying the enactment of uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WHITE presented a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Indiana, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to use their exertions to procure the establishment of a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. also presented a resolution of the same body, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to use their exertions to procure a grant of land for the construction and support of an asylum for the educat on and support of the deaf, dumb, and blind; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORVELL presented the memorial of a number of officers of the line of the army, praying for equalization of emolument with the staff; which was laid on the table.

Mr. WALKER submitted certain documents in relation to the claim of Willis McDonald; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of Enoch Evans, praying the confirmation of his title to a tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. PORTER presented the proceedings of a meeting held at Pontiac, in the State of Michigan, praying for the abolition of slavery, &c. the motion to receive which was,

On motion of Mr. KING, laid upon the table.

Mr. PORTER presented a memorial of the Farmers and Mechanics Bank of Michigan, praying an extension of time for the payment of a debt owing to the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill making appropriations for the payment of Revolutionary pensioners for the year 1840, reported the same with an amendment, which was considered and agreed to.

The bill was then taken up by general consent, read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of James M. Morgan was taken up as in Committee of the Whole, considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. NORVELL said there was a bill on the calendar, of very great importance to the new States, which he would ask the unanimous consent of the Senate now to take up for the purpose of making it a special order.

The Senate having unanimously concurred, the bill making grants of public lands to certain States, for purposes of internal improvement, was taken up, and made the special order of the day for Thursday, the 5th March.

Mr. NICHOLAS asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the bill to revive the act entitled "An act to enable claimants to lands within the limits of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas, to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," approved the 26th of May, 1824, and an act amending the same, and extending the provisions of said acts to claimants to lands within the States of Louisiana and Mississippi; which was agreed to.

The bill was then taken up, and made the order of the day for Monday, the 9th of March.

Mr. YOUNG, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the establishment of an additional pension agency at Springfield, Illinois, which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the message of the President on the subject, reported a bill for regulating commercial intercourse with the colony of Cayenne, in French Guiana, and to remit certain duties; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BETTS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Lucy Eaton and the petition of Aaron Payne, made unfavorable reports thereon, and asked to be discharged from their consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. PIERCE submitted the following resolution, which, by unanimous consent, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of affording Samuel Colt such aid as may enable him to make further experiments in his late discoveries and improvements in munitions of war.

BILLS PASSED.

The following engrossed bills, viz:

The bill for the relief of Charles Morgan of Louisiana;

The bill for the relief of Joseph Cochran;

The bill for the relief of Alvarez Fisk and the legal representatives of Thomas P. Eskridge;

The bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of William Conway;

The bill for the relief of Pierre Babin;

The bill for the relief of Joseph Campan;

The bill to confirm certain land claims in the Greensburg land district, State of Louisiana;

The bill for the relief of James M. Morgan; were taken up on their third reading, read a third time, and passed.

SPECIAL ORDER.

The report of the Select Committee on the assumption of State debts by the General Government was taken up, and Mr. SEVIER addressed the Senate at length on the subject.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. CLAY of Kentucky to postpone the whole subject indefinitely, and was decided in the negative—ayes 15, noes 27, as follows:

AYES—Messrs. Betts, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Merrick, Porter, Prentiss, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Tallmadge, and White—15.

NOES—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—27.

Mr. GRUNDY said that though he was very anxious to have the question taken on the report of the committee, he was not disposed to press the consideration of it more hastily than would comport with the convenience of the Senate. If, therefore, any Senator was desirous of addressing the Senate on the subject, he was willing that it should now be informally passed over.

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, the question was postponed until Monday next, with the understanding that it would be then taken up, and discussed until disposed of.

A message was received from the House, stating that the amendment of the Senate to the pension bill had been concurred in.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS.

The report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, unfavorable to the claim of Jubal B. Hancock, was then taken up, and after being discussed by Messrs. KING, SEVIER, LUMPKIN, CLAY of Alabama, WHITE, and HUBBARD,

Mr. KING moved that the report be referred back to the Committee, with instructions to bring in a bill for his relief.

The qustion was taken on this motion, and decided in the negative—ayes 9, noes 18.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, February 20, 1840.

After the reading of the journal,

Mr. FILLMORE raised a question as to the correctness of the journal, in that part which related to the cause for which he was arrested in his remarks on yesterday; and

After a few remarks from Messrs. PETRIKIN, FILLMORE, and HOLLEMAN, as to the matter of fact at issue,

Mr. FILLMORE moved to amend the journal by substituting for the record, as a reason why he was called to order, in substance, the following: "That while he was reading a resolution adopted by the Committee of Elections, in relation to the New Jersey contest, the reading was objected to, and he was called to order;" and

After some further discussion between Messrs. PETRIKIN, HAND, FILLMORE, and ADAMS, the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections by Mr. CAMPBELL, chairman, asking the House to grant that committee the privilege to have all printing done which is deemed necessary to facilitate the investigation of the New Jersey disputed election.

The question pending when the resolution was last under consideration, was the motion of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON to amend the proposition with the following, as a substitute:

Resolved, That all the proceedings and papers before the Committee of Elections, in relation to the New Jersey election, be reported to the House by the committee, with a statement of the names of the individuals who received a majority of all the votes given at the election for members of the Twenty-sixth Congress in that State, and that the same be printed for the use of the House, and the committee have leave to have such other papers and documents in relation to other contested elections, pending before them, printed by the public Printer of Congress.

The question immediately before the House was the appeal of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] from the decision of the SPEAKER, that it was not in order for the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] to read to the House the resolution or proceedings of the Committee of Elections, not then in possession of the House, and which it was proposed to print.

Mr. RUSSELL here rose and said it was known that the committees had not been afforded an opportunity to report this session; and asked the general consent of the House to move the following resolution:

Resolved, That the several committees of the House which have not been regularly called for reports of the present session of Congress, be called to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the journal, which shall have preference to all other business until the respective committees shall have been called.

Mr. PROFFIT objected.

Mr. RUSSELL moved to suspend the rules to enable him to offer the resolution.

The SPEAKER said the motion could not be admitted except by general consent, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] being entitled to the floor on another subject.

The appeal was debated at great length by

Mr. ADAMS, who had taken the appeal, he said, from absolute necessity, and contended that the gentleman from New York had the right to read the papers; and, furthermore, any member of the House had the right to call for the reading of all the papers which it was proposed to print; and read the rule in support of this position. He said if the decision of the CHAIR should be sustained, the freedom of speech would be denied that gentleman, and it would be difficult for him to assign a reason why it would be impossible for that committee to report. He thought he was entitled to the right to read; and was opposed to vote to give him permission to do that which he was entitled to do under the rule. Mr. A. believed, if the principles involved in the decision should obtain, the rights of a member, in this particular, would entirely depend hereafter upon the will of a majority. His experience on that floor taught him that privileges would be granted to a member with regard to whether he belonged to a majority or a minority party. The rules were a most detestable means in the hands of a majority. Every rule was, and could be, made the instrument in the hands of an arbitrary majority to restrict the rights of members, and he hoped there would be such a revolution, in this respect, as would restore the rules to their legitimate purposes. It was for the reason above that he wished to settle the principle that any member had the right to read, in illustration of, or to enforce his argument, any matter which he thought pertinent, and not leave it subject to the arbitrary will of a majority to say what his rights were. He maintained that the letter of the rules gives the right to call for the reading of any paper to elucidate an argument. The rights of members were already sufficiently pinched by means of the previous question, motions to lay on the table, and punctilious and captious questions of order.

Mr. PETRIKIN maintained that a committee was a distinct body of individuals, and that it was entirely out of order to read papers, and to arraign its proceedings, before the House, whilst they were exclusively under the control of the committee. The privileges of the committee could not be violated by a single member of it making use of matter which was alone under its control. He contended the latter clause of the original proposition to print was itself out of order, and the proposition to read was doubly so.

Mr. POPE agreed with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PETRIKIN,] that they could not discuss any papers and proceedings of a committee until they were reported to the House, or the committee was discharged. The proposition was what he considered an indirect way to discharge it; and he thought it would be more manly to move a formal order for a discharge. It was an attempt to decide the New Jersey contest without that thorough investigation which was contemplated when the matter was referred to the committee. The committee have sent for persons and papers to carry out the views of the House; and it would be improper to arrest the committee in the execution of its order. For one, he was not willing to vote blindfolded. If the question to report and to print could be entertained, the members should have the privilege of knowing what it was that was proposed to be printed. He suggested to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] that it would be better to discharge the committee than to press the question in its present form. If the appeal was withdrawn, he would raise the question whether it was competent to entertain the proposition to print.

Mr. BANKS rose to inquire of the CHAIR what was the actual question before the House. Was it whether the gentleman from New York should be permitted to proceed with his remarks, or to read the papers which had been acted on by the committee of which he was a member?

The CLERK, by direction of the SPEAKER, read from the journal the point of order in which Mr. ADAMS took an appeal.

Mr. BANKS would take the occasion to say that it was highly important, in settling precedents in reference to the proceedings of this House, that they should be uniform; that they should apply in all times to come to similar cases; and that they should not be adverse to the decisions of this House and all other legislative bodies. Now, he was perfectly willing that the gentleman from New York should read any papers that were applicable to the particular question before the House; and he concurred heartily with the gentleman from Massachusetts in the sentiment that the rights of the minority should be preserved; but in sustaining the decision of the CHAIR in this instance, he did not infringe the rights of the minority, nor stand in opposition to the well established principles of parliamentary law. Let him ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if it was in order to allude in debate to the votes taken in a committee room; to the particular proceedings adopted there; or, in short, to make any other than general allusions? How are you to know any thing of the proceedings of a committee without a report from it; and would it not be impolitic and unjust, as well as destructive of the very objects for which committees are constituted, to bring up and discuss detached parts of their proceedings before they had agreed on a report? Was it not known to the gentleman that to go into a discussion of what was done in a committee room, was always out of order? I know, said Mr. B. that we can allude to it in general terms, but it must be obvious to every one that we cannot go further than this without doing injustice. But the gentleman said you cannot require a member to vote on a question till it is read to him. In that assumption he agreed with him entirely. But what were they required to vote on. Was the paper the gentleman wished to read, the question before the House? Certainly not.

What, then, was the question? It was the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee to the resolution submitted by the chairman of the Committee of Elections. That was the question on which the gentleman was called upon to vote, and it had been read to the House again and again. He was willing, Mr. B. said, for the gentleman to read any papers having a bearing on the question before the House, and he should not himself have objected to the reading of this particular paper, had no other objection been made. But objection having been made, and the question having been brought directly before the House, in the shape of an appeal, he felt himself bound to sustain the decision of the CHAIR, and, in doing so, to conform to those established principles so essential to the regularity and order of parliamentary proceedings. But the gentleman from Massachusetts said yesterday, that the chairman of the committee had been allowed to detail at large, not only the proceedings of the committee, but to give the particular votes of the members; that is, stating that there were so many for and so many against particular motions. Very true, he listened to the gentleman with pleasure, and was also willing to listen to the gentleman from New York, though exceeding, in his opinion, the bounds of order. But what was he now called on to do? It was to set a precedent that would lead to the most mischievous results. If you can go into committees and drag forth their records to be commented on in this House; if you can say who voted for or against the particular propositions before them; or if you can read and discuss any special resolves they may have passed, you will embarrass their proceedings, destroy their usefulness, and engender jealousies and heart burnings in place of the harmony and good feeling that ought to prevail in them. If he had any influence with the gentleman from Massachusetts, he would ask him to withdraw his appeal; but, if the gentleman would not do so, he hoped the decision of the CHAIR would be sustained by the House. Mr. B. said he looked to the consequences that would result from reversing the settled practice of the House, rather than to the particular case before them; and for the purpose of progressing with the business of the day, if the gentleman would not consent to withdraw the appeal, he would move to lay it on the table.

Mr. ADAMS declined withdrawing the appeal.

Mr. GRANGER rose to make an inquiry of the CHAIR. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BANKS] had made a motion, as Mr. G. understood, to lay the appeal on the table. If that motion prevailed, would it not carry the resolution with it?

[Cries of "Certainly, certainly."]

The SPEAKER had not responded to this inquiry, when

Mr. BANKS withdrew the motion.

And the question recurring on the appeal,

Mr. BRIGGS addressed the House at some length in opposition to the decision of the CHAIR, urging that, in order to know whether a paper should be printed or not, a member was entitled first to know its contents, or that he must otherwise vote in the dark. Not only had the House the right to discuss in general terms the proceedings of a committee on the motion to print, but every member had the right to be present, and witness the proceedings of the committee. He agreed with Mr. BANKS that they could not discuss the propriety of individual votes of the members of the committee.

Mr. B. had not concluded when, the morning hour having elapsed, the House, on motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, called for the orders of the day.

Mr. GRAVES asked leave at this time to have referred certain documents, which were read for information, and which are as follows:

Whereas on the 20th of last month a member of this House addressed to the Postmaster General the following letter:

WASHINGTON CITY, Jan. 30, 1840.

SIR: In the course of some remarks I made in the House of Representatives on yesterday, I stated that I had been informed by a highly respectable gentleman of this city that he had learned from a source in which he placed the most implicit confidence, that a clerk in the General Post Office, at an annual salary of from twelve to fifteen hundred dollars, had gone to Kentucky with a view of establishing an Administration newspaper at the seat of Government in that State, and that he had not resigned his situation, but had hired a substitute at $40 per month to perform his duties, whilst he is drawing his salary of from one hundred to one hundred and twenty-five dollors per month from the Government.

I propose to write out and publish my remarks; but before I do so, I have thought it but just to you to afford you an opportunity to answer whether all or any portion of my information be correct, so that, if injustice has been done you, I may set the matter right in my written remarks.

The individual to whom I had reference as having gone to Kentucky to establish a paper is E. W. Robinson, formerly postmaster at Winchester, Virginia, and the name of the substitute he has hired is Hollis.

If my information be correct, it is proper the public should be informed of it through the more authentic source; if incorrect, it is due to you than an early opportunity be afforded you to contradict it. Therefore I submit to your consideration, and respectfully ask you to respond, with as little delay as your engagements will allow, to the following interrogatories:

1. Was E. B. Robinson recently a clerk in the General Post Office? and if so, at what salary?

2. Does he still hold the same clerkship? and if not, when did he resign it, and when did his pay cease? And if it has ceased, have you officially informed him of it? And if so, was it done in writing, or verbally? And whether before or after he left this city for Kentucky?

3. If he still hold the clerkship, who is, and has been, discharging his duties since he left this city? and what compensation does his substitute receive?

Respectfully, W. J. GRAVES.

Hon. AMOS KENDALL, Postmaster General.

To this letter the Postmaster General, on the following day, responded as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 31, 1840.

Hon. W. J. GRAVES, H. R. Present:

SIR: I received this morning your letter of yesterday, alluding to certain remarks affecting my official conduct, made by you in the House on the preceding day.

In that letter you say: "I propose to write out and publish my remarks; but, before I do so, I have thought it but just to you to afford you an opportunity to answer whether all or any portion of my information be correct, so that if injustice has been done you, I may set the matter right in my written remarks."

You then inform me that you had reference to the case of E. W. Robinson, esq. supposed to be a clerk in the Post Office Department, who, it is said, is about to commence the publication of a newspaper at Frankfort, Kentucky, and you put to me several specific interrogatories touching those matters, to which you request my reply with as little delay as my engagements will allow.

Now, sir, although I do not question the right of a member of Congress to become the retailer, on the floor of the House, of the false and malignant gossip which taints the atmosphere of this city, I do deny his right to call on the party so slandered to aid him in escaping the responsibility of reducing such slanders to libels in a written speech. I very much regret that this idea of doing justice to me did not occur to you before you made your attack in the House. You admit it to be "just" that I shall have an opportunity to make the truth known before your speech be written. Was it less "just" that such an opportunity should be afforded me before it was spoken? If, before holding me up as a delinquent in duty by remarks publicly uttered, to be noted by reporters, and scattered by letter writers over the whole Union, on no better authority than the second hand "information of a very respectable gentleman," you had done me the justice to inquire into their truth, I could have had no objection to putting you in possession of all the facts of the case within my knowledge. As it is, I deem that justice to myself will be best promoted by declining to aid you in making up for the public a speech different from that you uttered on the floor of the House.

Respectfully, AMOS KENDALL.

And whereas, on the 28th of last December, said Robinson did, by letter, published in the Globe, resign the office of President of "The Democratic Association of the District of Columbia," which letter of resignation and the reply thereto are as follows:

"At a meeting of the Democratic Association of the District of Columbia, held on the 30th of December, 1839, the following resignation was received:

WASHINGTON, Dec. 28, 1839.

To the members of the Democratic Association of the District of Columbia.

GENTLEMEN: Being about to take up my abode in a distant quarter of our country, the necessity devolves upon me of resigning the situation of President of your Association—a situation conferred upon me more through kindness than from any merit of my own. I cannot make this communication, and perform this act, gentlemen, without availing myself of the privilege which it affords me of expressing to you the grateful character of the feelings which your confidence in me has inspired—feelings of gratitude which will induce me to remember the members of this Association, collectively and individually, so long as I shall know how to appreciate the cheering liberality of friends, or retain the remembrance of any kindly act.

But, gentlemen, although about to separate myself from you, I beg you to be assured that I shall still number myself as a soldier in the same good cause in which you are engaged; that I shall still be found doing battle in defence of our common principles—in defence of those principles upon which we feel depend our country's glory and the preservation of the liberty of the people of this great nation.

The nature of the service, gentlemen, will not be changed by my removal; the field only in which it is to be performed will. Of one thing I beg you to be assured, and it is, that, wherever I go, I shall not cease to use my utmost exertions to advance the principles of Democracy—the principles which you and I have been taught to believe are identified with all that is desirable in our happy form of government.

For the success of our Association, (for so I have the right to call it until this letter is read,) I have felt, and shall continue to feel, the most lively interest; and for the welfare and happiness of its members, one and all, no one can entertain a greater anxiety than he who now addresses you.

In giving you the parting hand, gentlemen, allow me to assure you that I am, sincerely, your friend and servant,

E. W. ROBINSON.

After a letter was read, a committee of three was appointed to prepare a response, which was composed of James H. Smoot, Colonel Richard Coxe, and Benjamin Evans, who submitted the following, which was unanimously adopted, and ordered to be signed by the officers of the Association and transmitted:

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30, 1839.

SIR: In retiring from the Presidency of the Democratic Association of the District of Columbia, you bear with you the best wishes of its members for your health, and happiness, and usefulness.

Although they regret your absence from the Chair, in which you have manifested so much suavity of manners, accompanied by all the intelligence desirable in fulfilling its duties—duties especially onerous, from the fact that the Association, being in its infancy, required a presiding officer acquainted with parliamentary usage, and in which you have been peculiarly happy; yet the circumstances attending your departure are of a character which forbid, on the part of the Association, any selfish repinings; aware that in the more extended domain of usefulness laid open to your exertion, you will find a more abundant demand for your energy, and a wider field for the extension of Democratic principles.

We take pleasure in recognising in you, sir, a constant and unwavering friend of the Republican cause. The polls, the press, the legislative councils, endorse your orthodoxy; and we speed your onward march of usefulness in a field where the vantage ground is now the enemy's, satisfied that no Democrat could take the command of the Kentucky Argus, since a Kendall directed its course, with a prospect of a more sanguinary battle, in which the skill of a veteran will be required; and that veteran we speed onward, in the name of our hallowed principles, even in you, sir, the first president of our infant Association, to his duty—a sacred duty—which we cherish an abiding faith will be fulfilled.

LUND WASHINGTON, Jr. First V. President.
THOMAS SPILLMAN, Second Vice President.
WILLIAM H. DIETZ, Secretary.
JOSEPH M. MUNDING, Treasurer.
JESSE E. DOW, Corresponding Secretary.

To E. W. ROBINSON, Esq.

And whereas the said E. W. Robinson, on the said 28th of last December, but one or two days before his departure from this city to enter upon the duties of editor of his newly established paper called "The Kentucky Yeoman," at Frankfort, (Ky.) in order to anticipate and realize the money before he left for a portion of his salary as clerk in the General Post Office Department for the year 1840, did draw, in favor of Charles J. Nourse, of this city, an order, of which the following is a copy:

"The agent for paying salaries in the Post Office Department, will please pay to Charles J. Nourse one hundred dollars on the first day of February, 1839, in full of my salary for the month of January, and this shall be his receipt in full for the same.

December 28, 1839. E. W. ROBINSON."

And as it appears from the foregoing facts that there is good reason to believe that, previously to the departure of said Robinson from this city, the Postmaster General agreed with him that he (Robinson) should be continued as a clerk in his (the Postmaster General's) office in this city, at a salary of $1,200 per year, whilst he was to be permitted to reside and edit a party paper at the seat of Government of the State of Kentucky, and to employ a substitute, at about a third of his salary, to perform his duties here:

And whereas, if the Postmaster General is in the corrupt practice of paying out of the public money two or three times as much for the clerical duties performed in his office as the persons performing them actually receive; whether the overplus be all paid to the Postmaster General himself, or be equally divided between him and his nominal clerk, or be all paid over to a political friend and nominal clerk editing a paper in a distant State; it is expedient that the subject should be examined into, and reported on to this House, in order that the compensation paid to clerks in the Post Office Department may be reduced to a proper amount, and in order that the Postmaster General may be arraigned for malfeasance in office: therefore,

Resolved, That this whole subject be referred to the Committee on the Expenditures in the Post Office Department, with instructions to examine into and report upon it to this House, and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

The SPEAKER said the motion could only be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. LEADBETTER wished to know if these resolutions would be open to amendment. If so, he wished them to lie over.

Mr. ALBERT SMITH rising and objecting,

Mr. GRAVES moved a suspension of the rules, and asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, being taken, were—Yeas 118, nays 82.

So the rule was not suspended, (two-thirds not voting therefor.)

The House then took up the bill making appropriations for the payment of the Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1840, which had been returned from the Senate with an amendment authorizing the several pension agents to administer the oaths required to be taken, and to charge the same fee as is allowed to State officers for administering similar oaths.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the amendment was concurred in.

The business next in order was the bill on the SPEAKER'S table making appropriations for the removal of the Red river raft.

Mr. BEATTY, of Pennsylvania, was entitled to the floor; but, on the understanding that his title thereto would not be affected if the subject was laid over, he yielded to

Mr. SERGEANT, who moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the CENSUS BILL.

Mr. SERGEANT moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering the bill from the Senate to amend the act of the last session for taking the sixth census.

Mr. JONES of Virginia observed, that it had been his intention to ask the House to go into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of considering the bill to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. SERGEANT observed that there would be ample time to consider both bills. The census bill he did not suppose would occupy much time, and the other bill could be considered immediately after it, before the committee rose.

The SPEAKER having put the question on Mr. SERGEANT'S motion,

Mr. JONES of Virginia said he begged leave to mention, before the question was taken, that there was a bill from the Senate lying on the SPEAKER'S table, to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions, and that the law by which this office was created, expires on the first of March next. He hoped, therefore, that this bill would be the first taken up.

The SPEAKER having stated that the motion of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania had precedence, the question was taken and decided in the affirmative, and the House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. BANKS in the Chair, and took up the bill from the Senate to amend the act to provide for taking the sixth census, &c.

Mr. CUSHING observed that it was his intention, the other day, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SERGEAN] moved to go into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of considering this bill, to submit an amendment, introducing certain additional items of statistical information to be obtained by it. He had ascertained, however, on inquiry at the State Department, that most of the blanks had been printed and circulated, and that great practical inconvenience would result from introducing the additional items that he had contemplated. He would, therefore, refrain from offering any amendment, and hoped that the bill would pass without the introduction of any additional items.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to amend the bill by adding the following:

"And that it shall be the duty of the said marshals and deputies, respectively, to take an enumeration of each and every insane lunatic or idiotic pauper within their districts, whether in asylums, prisons, or running at large; every person in the several State and county prisons, confined therein for crime; every pauper supported at public or private charge; together with the age, sex, and color of each; stating whether bond or free."

Mr. SERGEANT hoped the amendment would not be pressed. He explained the necessity for the passage of the bill, which was intended to remedy the defects and supply the deficiencies of the bill of last session. The Government being straitened for time in complying with the constitutional requirements to take the decennial census, had, in anticipation, prepared and sent abroad the printed forms which would be required, in conformity with the bill in its present form, and the marshals were only waiting its passage to proceed in their duties: if amendments were moved and agreed to, these forms might become useless, and great delay and inconvenience be experienced: it was barely possible before the 1st of June to get ready to take the census.

Mr. HUBBARD observed that he had not, heretofore, had an opportunity of seeing the bill, but it appeared to him that between this and June, when it was to go into operation, there was ample time to remedy any little inconveniencies that would grow out of the amendment. It would take very little time for the Department to communicate to the various marshals in the United States the additional items of information that were to be obtained. We ought to know, said he, the number of lunatics and idiots in the country, and the number of persons imprisoned; and was it possible that the Congress of the United States, in two sessions, had not time to obtain this important information, which was in the possession of every civilized Government in the world? Surely the instructions to obtain this information could be prepared and forwarded before June. The information he wished to obtain was highly important, and he hoped the House would adopt the amendment.

Mr. PETRIKIN thought the adoption of the amendment would be carrying legislation too far. It would, in his opinion, be interfering with the legislation of the States. Every State Government had this information, and that was all that was necessary. The subject, said he, does not belong to us, and I hope the House will not adopt it.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana thought the amendment unnecessary, inasmuch as ample power was given to the President, by the bill of the last session, to obtain all the statistical information that was required. As allusion had been made to the defects of the bill of the last session, he thought it due to himself, by whom it was reported, to explain how they originated. The bill, as it passed the House, was unobjectionable, but amendments had been made to it in the Senate which created all the difficulties that had been spoken of. It passed the House on the third day preceding the adjournment, and was made as perfect as the limited time allowed would permit; but on being sent to the Senate, some of the gentlemen there, who were so scrupulous about State rights, discovered that the marshals could not commence taking the census till the entire expiration of the ten years after the last. The alteration in the bill was then made, and the effect of it was to create all the difficulties which had since arisen.

The question was then taken on Mr. HUBBARD's amendment, and it was rejected without a division.

Mr. PETRIKIN then moved to amend the bill by reducing the salary of the principal clerk employed on the business of the census, in the State Department, from $2000 per annum to $1200.

Mr. ADAMS opposed the amendment on the ground that the compensation of this officer was fixed by the Secretary of State, with a full knowledge of the duties to be performed, and the responsibilities incurred.

Mr. PETRIKIN said he had no objection to paying men a fair compensation for the services they performed; but he had no idea of sanctioning such inequalities as this bill proposed. Here this superintendent was to receive $2000, while the recording clerk and packer, employed on the same business, were to receive, the one but $800 and the other but $600. He wanted the men who did the work to get compensations bearing a more just proportion to that of the gentleman who was to superintend their labors than the bill allowed, and for this purpose he would move to increase them from $800 and $600 to $1000 and $800.

Mr. SERGEANT referred his colleague to the report of the Secretary of State, in which that officer spoke of the importance of having a gentleman qualified to superintend this business, and that he had employed such a one at a salary of $2000 per annum. The superintendent would not, as his colleague supposed, be idle; he would have other and arduous duties to perform besides overlooking the labors of his subordinates. He was to take charge of all the details of the business, under the direction of the Department, until it was completed.

Mr. PETRIKIN made some additional observations in support of his amendment. He thought a salary of $1200 ample for the superintendent. He knew many worthy and well qualified individuals, who would be glad to take the employment at that compensation. As to the responsibility and arduous duties the superintendent, it was all imaginary. He did not believe that his duties would require a much greater degree of talent, or involve heavier responsibilities, than those of the recording clerk; at all events, not to such an extent as to authorize so great a disproportion in the salaries as $2,000 and $800. His colleague spoke of the Department having employed a gentleman competent to discharge these important duties. Now what constituted a gentleman? Was it a ruffled shirt, fine coat, and white hands? For his part he judged of men by their qualifications and their moral worth, and not by the clothes they wore.

Mr. WICK said if the gentleman from Pennsylvania would agree to fix the salary of this officer at $1 500, he would go for it; and Mr. W. moved accordingly to insert $1,500 instead of $2,000, as in the bill.

The question was then taken on Mr. WICK's motion, (it being the largest sum,) and it was carried in the affirmative.

Mr. PETRIKIN then moved to increase the salary of the recording clerk to $1,000, and the packer to $800; which motion was rejected.

Mr. DAWSON next moved to amend the bill by adding 33⅓ per cent. to the compensation of the assistant marshals, for the additional labor imposed on them by the bill, of procuring the statistical information it required. The duties required of these assistants were (Mr. D. said) very important, and required men of activity and intelligence. In addition to taking the mere enumeration of the inhabitants of their district, they had to obtain a great deal of valuable important information; and to show the inadequacy of the compensation allowed them, he would call the attention of the House to one fact. An assistant marshal, for taking the census of five thousand inhabitants, and collecting the various items of statistical information required, was to receive but $100. The time it would take him to discharge these duties would exceed six months, provided he did it fairly and honestly for the benefit of the country. It was out of the question to suppose that the marshals could obtain the services of competent assistants for this small sum. Mr. D. said he had received a number of letters calling his attention to this subject, and stating that the business could not be performed without a more adequate compensation.

Mr. SMITH of Maine thought the gentleman from Georgia was mistaken. There was a provision in the law of last session allowing $2 50 for every fifty persons where the district was sparsely settled, if, in the opinion of the district judge, such additional compensation was necessary.

Mr. DAWSON said that this provision would not apply in many parts of his State, where the marshal could not get the services performed for the compensation allowed. The labor was far greater than that required in taking the last census, and greater intelligence in the assistants was also necessary. If Congress did not allow such a compensation as would secure the services of competent persons, the statistics of the States would be grossly misrepresented, and confusion and disorder would be introduced in consequence of one after another of the assistants resigning as soon as they came to know the extent of the duties imposed on them. One gentleman had informed him that he had received a letter from the marshal of his State, (Vermont,) saying that it would be impossible for him to procure the services of assistants for the compensation allowed by the bill.

Mr. SERGEANT observed that the object of this bill was not to review the bill of the last session, but only to supply some omissions in it. That bill had been so far carried into effect as to employ some of the assistants. When the bill of last session was passed, it did not enter into the head of any man that the compensation provided for the assistants was too small. Mr. S. thought the compensation sufficient, and hoped the amendment would not prevail.

After some additional remarks from Mr. DAWSON,

Mr. CARTER of Tennessee observed that from his knowledge of the numerous applications for employment under this law, he was satisfied that an abundance of competent persons could be employed for the compensation it allowed. He knew, further, that the offer of these employments had been made an engine in his State for political purposes; and that hopes of employment had been held out not only to one individual, but to many others, to induce them to support the party of the Administration. The marshal, in his part of the country, not only endeavored to effect important results in the last elections, by holding out inducements to prominent and influential individuals, but to attain the object he had in view, kept back the appointments till after the election was over. He further understood that it was the custom with this marshal to inquire as to the political opponents of those who applied to him for employment, and to invariably refuse them if they happened to be Whigs saying, that if they belonged to the Administration party they would stand a better chance. He had heard of one case in which a Whig, who was promised an appointment if he would turn Democrat, changed his politics, and became a supporter of the Administration.

Mr. SMITH of Vermont observed, that as allusion had been made to information obtained from him by the gentleman from Georgia, he would take this occasion to state that he had received a letter form the marshal of Vermont, stating that competent assistants could not be engaged for the compensation allowed by the act of last session. The marshal had made a calculation showing the time that would be occupied in putting the interrrogatories required, which amounted to eighty; and allowing one and a half minutes for each question, it would take two hours for each family of six persons. Then taking ten hours as the amount of a day's labor, the assistant would be able to take only thirty families per day, which would give him a compensation of seventy-two cents; and allowing him $1 25 per day for his expenses, he would be fifty-three cents out of pocket.

Mr. BOND said that, when the last census was taken, the marshal of Ohio paid his assistants less than the law allowed them, taking their receipt for the whole sum, and putting the difference into his own pocket. Afterwards, the assistants sued him for the money, and recovered it in the courts of Ohio.

Mr. CARTER said he understood that the same thing had been done by the marshal of East Tennessee.

Mr. WATTERSON understood his colleague [Mr. CARTER] to state to the House that the marshal of East Tennessee was in the habit of holding out inducements to individuals for the purpose of influencing the politics of the State; giving them to understand that, if they would fight the battles of the Administration, he would give them employment. He wished to know of his colleague if he understood him correctly in making this statement. If his colleague did not correct him, he would take it for granted that he had quoted the substance of his remarks correctly. Now, he asked of his colleague upon what authority he made this statement. Mr. W. said he knew the character of the marshal, and that he was a highly honorable man—respected in the community in which he lived, and enjoyed their confidence and esteem in the highest degree, as was evidenced by their electing him to the high and responsible office of sheriff for ten or fifteen successive years. There was not a man in East Tennessee who enjoyed a higher character. Upon what grounds did his colleague, then, speak as he did of such a man? Upon mere rumor? He hoped the gentleman would not make such charges against a citizen of his own State, upon no other foundation than rumor. Men's characters were too sacred to be sported with, without some better authority than his colleague had given. When I speak of a man's character, said Mr. W. I shall speak only of my own knowledge, or upon good responsible testimony. But it seemed that the marshal of East Tennessee was denounced by his colleague for making inquiries as to the politics of those who applied to him for employment. Now he did not know if this was so very criminal, or worthy of being made the foundation of so grave a charge against the marshal; but his colleague, who censured him so much for making those inquiries, knew, or at least ought to know, that one-half, if not more, of the office holders in East Tennessee, and he might add throughout the State, belonged to the Whig party. For his part, were he in the marshal's place, he would not hesitate to make these inquiries; and if he found a political friend who was as well qualified, he would bestow on him the appointment, in preference to giving it to a political opponent. But it seemed that one Whig was promised an appointment if he would turn Democrat; and, for the trifling salary allowed an assistant marshal, he had changed his politics. Now if this were so, the Whig was easily bought up, and, in his opinion, the marshal made a bad bargain of it; for he wanted no man in the Democratic ranks who would change his political creed for so pitiful a consideration. We want no offices, nor the salaries attached to them, (said Mr W.) to carry our elections in Tennessee next fall. We want nothing more than the principles of our party and the confidence of the people in the President that he will carry them out, to ensure us success.

Mr. JAMESON said he held in his hand a letter from the marshal of Missouri, stating that he could not get competent assistants in the several counties of the State to perform the duties required by the act of last session, for the compensation allowed; and that the census could not be taken in several of the counties, unless a higher compensation was given. If the calculation given to the House by the gentleman from Vermont was correct, as he had no doubt but it was, many of the assistants, so far from getting enough to defray their expenses, would be losers by the employment. The marshal of his State informed him that, in some of his counties, there would be no difficulty in getting assistants; but that in others it would be impossible to take the census at all without giving a higher compensation, and that he had been obliged to give assurances to several that he engaged, that endeavors would be made to obtain from Congress a more equitable remuneration for their labor, in order to induce them to accept the employment. He did not know of any question that could come up before that House without hearing the cry raised about Executive patronage and the interference of office holders with the elections. Now, he would say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CARTER] that, in the State of Missouri, he had never heard of the question being asked of an applicant for employment, whether he was a Whig or a Democrat, though he well knew that a great many of the assistants there were Whigs. He heard, for the first time, too, that the assistant marshals were in the habit of going among the people to electioneer in favor of the Administration party. Now he did not believe that a few dollars more or less would induce a man to take an active part in political contests, unless his turn of mind influenced him to it. The gentleman said that the marshal of East Tennessee put questions to the applicants to him for employment, to ascertain whether they were Whigs or Democrats. He should like to know if the gentleman was by the side the marshal when he put these questions, and if not, how he got his information with regard to the facts he stated.

Mr. CARTER did not wish the gentleman to misrepresent what he said. He did not speak of facts within his own knowledge, but spoke of what was an established and well grounded report, coming from the information of the most respectable persons in the State.

Mr. JAMESON. Then it is report only from which the gentleman speaks, and that report is to be reverberated from this hall, and echoed in all the Whig presses of the country. Were the characters of men to be held up to public odium upon mere idle rumors, without one solitary fact that could be proved against them? With regard to the amendment before the House, he was surprised that there should be any objection to it. The information to be obtained by these assistant marshals was acknowledged by all to be highly important and useful, and it had been conclusively shown that competent persons would not perform the duties, in many parts of the country, for the trifling compensation allowed. Sir, said Mr. J. you can pay every officer of this Government liberal wages but those who perform the most laborious duties. There were many counties in Missouri of from 50 to 100 miles square, with a sparse population; and in making up the statistical tables for Missouri, which was a fine field for obtaining such information, he did not believe that the assistants could make one cent. They would have to go round to every farmer's house and set down how many barrels of corn and how many bushels of wheat he made, how many children he sent to school, and, in short, to write down every thing pertaining to his business or his family. I do hope, said Mr. J. that while you are paying yourselves liberally, and every officer of the House liberally, that you will pay something like a fair compensation to those who perform these arduous duties.

Mr. CARTER of Tennessee said he was very much surprised at the attack made on him by his colleague, in defence of the marshal of East Tennessee; for it must be supposed that he had a better knowledge of the character and conduct of that individual, from living in his immediate neighborhood, than his colleague could have, who lived in another and distant part of the State. His colleague said that this marshal was a man of character and standing in society. Now he should like his colleague to tell this House by what standard he estimated character and conduct. If his colleague had an intimate acquaintance with this individual, as he would infer from his remarks, and knew his character well, and esteemed and reputed him to be a gentleman, he was only astonished that he occupied a seat on this floor. Indeed it was conclusive to him that either his colleague must be totally ignorant of the conduct and character of this person, or that his constituents did not know him. Now if his colleague wanted to know any thing of this marshal of East Tennessee, let him go to the other end of the Capitol, and inquire of the Senator from his State, what were the charges brought against him, previous to his appointment by the President, and his confirmation by the Senate.

The CHAIR here interrupted Mr. C. and told him that his remarks were not in order.

Mr. WATTERSON moved that his colleague be permitted to speak in his own way; and the question being put to the House, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. CARTER continued. With regard to this marshal of East Tennessee, he would observe that if any gentleman wanted to be informed as to his character, he might be so by going to the only Senator from Tennessee, in the other end of the Capitol. As far as his information extended, that individual did not sustain a character for strict integrity, before his appointment to the office he holds. There were very serious charges made against him, and that, too, by the most respectable men in Tennessee. He did not stand here as the accuser of that individual; but when he conceived it necessary for the public interests, he was at all times ready to speak out. But the attacks made on him by his colleague, reminded him of a story he had heard relating to a horse race, got up between a white man and an Indian. When the horses were on the ground, and about starting, the Indian, after examining his antagonist's horse, proposed mounting behind its rider, and then, said he, we can whip him on two sides at the same time. This was the case with the gentleman from Missouri and his colleague; they both wanted to mount him at the same time. To return to the subject of this marshal; Mr. C. said it was well known in his section of the country that there was not a single appointment conferred upon any individual who was not a member of the Administration party, except one, and that one was a Whig who agreed to change his politics, and go over to the support of the party in power. This fact, he thought, ought to be sufficient evidence to the gentleman from Missouri that the pay of these deputy marshals was too high. One other fact he would mention. One marshal in a German settlement, after eulogizing the head of the Administration, did come out and say to one of the farmers, that if he would agree to support that Administration, he would be compensated. The German indignantly rejected the proposal, and said that he never was so insulted before in his life. Now, sir, said Mr. C. as to this marshal of East Tennessee, I have no confidence in him; and he so expressed himself to the Senator from his State when he applied to him for information concerning him; and he expressed himself in this way before his appointment was confirmed by the Senate. He had, on that occasion, informed the Senator that the man did not sustain a fair character; and he was then asked in what particular, and how he obtained his information. He had satisfied the Senator on the first point; and further told him that he got his information from general rumor in that section of the country. He had said that he knew nothing of this marshal of his own knowledge, but that he derived his information, with regard to him, from as reputable men as any in the country. Yet, in opposition to the information he had thus given, the Senate had confirmed the appointment.

Mr. JAMESON said he wished to correct an error into which some gentlemen had fallen. In the counties of Missouri, which were considered a densely populated, under the construction given to the act of the last session, the marshal will have no right to expend this five dollars for every additional one hundred persons. In such counties the assistants would only get two dollars, and the marshal stated that he could not get competent persons for that sum. In the sparsely populated counties, however, they would get the five dollars, and there the marshal would have no difficulty in employing assistants.

Mr. WATTERSON observed that his colleague [Mr. CARTER] was very much mistaken in supposing that he had made an attack on him. He had endeavored to defend a citizen of his State from an unjust and unnecessary attack made on his character by his colleague, and this his colleague construed into an attack on him. It was no such thing. He had simply replied to the charges made against an absent and deserving individual. It was far from him, Mr. W. said, to attack his colleague personally; he had no such intention; but when he heard such severe censures cast upon the marshal of East Tennessee, another colleague of his, [Mr. BLACKWELL,] who personally knew the individual thus implicated, assured him that his character stood as fair as that of his colleague himself, or of any individual in Tennessee, not even excepting the gentleman's "Cato at Knoxville. He did not profess to be acquainted with this gentleman himself, but from the information of his colleague, [Mr. BLACKWELL,] he was satisfied that he was a worthy and respectable man. In further support of this gentleman's character, he would also refer to his friend from Indiana, now the Democratic candidate for Governor of that State, who had lived in Tennessee for many years, and knew him well enough to endorse his character. But it seemed, according to the statements of his colleague, that some charges were made against this individual previous to the confirmation of his appointment by the Senate; but he was acquitted with honor, for he received the appointment. It was easy enough to make charges against men's characters. He could make charges against his colleague; but it was one thing to make charges, and another thing to support them. Sir, (said Mr. W.) if mere charges could prostrate men, the whole Democratic party would go down; for they have been denounced again and again as corruptionists, the spoils party, with other vituperative epithets applied to them. He regretted that his colleague should have made those charges against an individual after he had been honorably acquitted by one of the highest tribunals of the country. I do not know (said Mr. W.) whether these deputy marshals are paid too much or not enough; and, therefore, have not made up my mind how I shall vote on this question. His colleague had treated the House to a story about a horse race, which he was not fortunate enough to hear the whole of. The application, however, reached him, and that was, that he and the gentleman from Missouri both jumped upon his colleague at the same time. Now, he would suggest that the metaphor of his colleague was not a very inappropriate one, as he was known in his district as "the big black horse!!"

Mr. McCLELLAN did not rise to take part in the discussion of the immediate question before the House, but having heard insinuations made on this floor against the Marshal of East Tennessee, whom he knew to be a highly respectable and worthy man, he felt it his duty to rise and defend him. His colleague, [Mr. CARTER] had not only made charges against the Marshal, but had said that his appointments generally were men of bad character, such as no confidence could be placed in. Mr. M. said, so far as his knowledge extended, they were men of good character. As respects these men who were appointed in his district, he averred that they were men of unimpeachable character. And further, he could not remain silent in his seat when he heard it asserted that any of his fellow-citizens, even if they were Whigs, were willing to sell their consciences for the pitiful consideration of the office of deputy marshal in a mountainous district, and where the labors were so great that they would hardly be able to make their daily expenses. Indeed, when they came to see the number of interrogatories they were called on to propound, and the extent of the duties required of them, many would throw up their employments. His colleague, [Mr. CARTER] charged that the marshal of East Tennessee had used his office for party purposes; and had promised employment to various individuals, on condition that they would change their politics, and come out in support of the Administration. I will not take up the time of the House, said Mr. M. by entering into a labored defence of the individual thus assailed; I know him to be an honorable and respectable man, and that he held for a number of years the sheriffalty of one of the most populous counties in my colleague's district, to which office he was elected by the suffrages of his fellow-citizens. In the discharge of the duties of that office he was universally known as a correct, amiable, and business man. But he sustains a bad character in the eyes of my colleague, for he is an active and influential man in his district, and went against my colleague with all the zeal and energy he possessed, and that was enough to ensure his condemnation. But the charges, however, against this individual, which were now so gravely spoken of, first originated in a little newspaper, and from thence found their way to the Senate of the United States. Now he did not hear of these charges when they were before the Senate; nor did he believe there were any charges made before the Senate at the time that his appointment was confirmed by that body; but inquiries having been made of him respecting the marshal's character, by one of the Senators of his State, he gave him all the information in his power, and then wrote home for further information, and the answers he received were from some of the best men in Green county, fully endorsing the character of the individual in every particular. But his colleague said that some of the applicants for office in his State had changed their politics, and had been bought over by the pitiful consideration of a paltry office. Now, he would mention one fact he knew in relation to this subject. There were two applicants for the employment of deputy marshal in his district, one of whom was a Whig, and the other a Democrat. The marshal wrote to him, inquiring which of these two was best qualified for the employment, and he not having sufficient information on the subject, referred the matter to the people of the neighborhood, by whom he was informed that the Whig was the best qualified; and on his stating this to the marshal, the Whig received the appointment. With regard to the compensation of these assistants, he would observe that their labors had been increased one hundred per cent. more than what they were in 1830. They must take down from every farmer the number of bushels of corn and wheat he makes, with the number of yards of cloth made by his wife. He was for economy in its fullest extent; but he did not think that true economy consisted in withholding from the laborer his hire. His wished to give to every man a fair compensation for the labor he performed. He must again express his regrets that the marshal of East Tennessee had been dragged before the House in this way. From his knowledge of him, as well as from information derived from the most respectable sources, he was satisfied that he was a very clever business man, and of the highest respectability. The very circumstance of his being elected to a lucrative and responsible office by the suffrages of his fellow-citizens, and that he held that office for many years, was of itself a high recommendation in his favor. He was, moreover, advantageously known as a prominent member of one of our most respectable religious societies.

Mr. CARTER here interrupted Mr. M. and said he wished to give him one evidence of the disinterestedness of this gentleman.

Mr. McCLELLAN could not give way to his colleague. He knew the circumstance to which his colleague wished to allude. It was the refusal of the marshal to let the Whig party use the church of which he was a member, for a Whig meeting, and for making Whig speeches in. Now he knew (Mr. M. said) that the marshal was a strong party man, and went zealously for his party and his principles; but did that make him a rascal in the estimation of his colleague? His colleague was a strong party man, and was he a rascal for that reason? [Much laughter.] Mr. M. said he was not gifted with fluency of language—he was not a lawyer or professional man, but a farmer, accustomed to plainness of language as well as to plain dealing. He had sat silent here for years listening with patience to the remarks of other gentlemen, even when tedious and out of place; and he would not have said a word at this time, had it not been for the uncalled-for attack upon one of his constituents.

The question was then taken on Mr. DAWSON's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. PETRIKIN then offered the following, to be prefixed as a preamble to the bill:

Whereas the members of the last session of the Twenty-fifth Congress deferred doing much of the important business of the country until the last day of the session, and on that day were compelled to act without deliberation for want of time; and whereas, among other acts thus passed, the act authorizing the taking of the census within the United States has been found so imperfect that it cannot be executed—therefore, to remedy those imperfections produced by said defective legislation and neglect of duty of said members of Congress, Be it enacted, &c.

Mr. DAWSON expressed his regret that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should have submitted a motion so disrespectful to the body of which he was a member. He considered such proceeding as one unworthy of the House, and that it ought to meet the decided disapprobation of every member of it. If we act (said he) as a body, every member of Congress is proportionably responsible for the proceedings in which he participates, and therefore each one must feel that some share of the censure implied in this preamble applies to himself. He had looked (Mr. D. said) to the course of the House frequently with much disapprobation; but, though he could not approve of all its acts, yet he could not sit silent and permit one member to attack his associates in this way. We represent the American character, and therefore should all unite in preventing reproach from being cast upon it. For one, he (Mr. D.) considered the motion as a great indignity offered to this House by one of its older members, and one who had participated in the proceedings which he so unsparingly censures. Sir, said Mr. D. I appeal to you and to those who have been longer on this floor than I have, whether there are not a few individuals here who have been mainly instrumental in causing the confusion and disorder that have sometimes prevailed in the House. There are a few here, as there always are in large bodies, whose irregularities have done much to injure the character of this body. But should censure, therefore, attach to the whole; was that any reason why such insinuations should be spread upon the records of the country, and that, too, by an actor in the proceedings he condemns? Mr. D. concluded by saying that he had never witnessed a stronger indignity offered to a legislative body than this resolution, which was not even expected by the mover to be adopted, and he hoped the gentleman would withdraw it, with a becoming apology to the House.

Mr. PETRIKIN observed that the gentleman from Georgia was mistaken when he said that he participated in the scenes which took place at the close of the session. This was not true. He, at that time, told the House that he highly condemned such course of proceeding, and opposed them step by step in their progress. As to the preamble now offered, there was not only nothing in it disrespectful to the House, but it was a plain and correct statement of facts. If there was any thing disrespectful in it, let the gentleman from Georgia point out what it was. He knew, Mr. P. said, that many things were done here at the close of the last session, which were disgraceful to members as individuals, to the House, and to the country. Does the gentleman expect them to be kept secret and concealed from the country, or that members were bound to secresy by oaths similar to freemasons? If he did, Mr. P. said he did not agree to his doctrine. He did nothing here that was not fit for the public eye. Did not the gentleman recollect the fact that an item of $16,000 was struck out of the general appropriation bill by a vote of the House, and that it was afterwards, surreptitiously, or by mistake, inserted in the CLERK's room, and then passed by the House sub silentio, without any body knowing any thing about it? Did he not know that thousands of dollars were voted away at the close of every session, when many members were not in a situation to know what was done or doing in matters of the utmost importance to the people in various quarters of the Union? Were these things to be concealed from the American people, and was he to be denounced as having offered an indignity to the body for calling its attention to them? He would tell the gentleman that such denunciations fell harmless to the ground, and that he cared as little for his blast of wind as the gentleman did for his charges. I never, said Mr. P. participated in the scenes that disgraced the close of the last session. The previous session I left the House in disgust on the occurrence of similar scenes. In offering his preamble he had no intention of offering an indignity to the House. He drew it up in such plain and intelligible language as he was capable of, and did not go to Tom, Dick, and Harry, to consult with them as to what phraseology he should use. He was not an adept in using language to mystify falsehoods, and make them appear like truths. He stood here as the Representative of independent and intelligent freemen, and as such, did not feel it necessary to consult any man here as to the course he should pursue. He considered it his right and duty to oppose such hasty and improper legislation, in which they not only voted away thousands of dollars, but disgraced themselves; and knew that he should be sustained by his constituents for so doing. Mr. P. said before he resumed his seat he would give notice that hereafter he should suffer no bill making any appropriation, or containing any important provisions, to be read by its title, as long as he was able to keep his seat in this hall.

Mr. DAWSON said if he had applied any epithets to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he was not aware of it, and was sorry for it. He never used language injurious to any body; and if such language was used towards him, he was perfectly satisfied that it would be correctly appreciated by those who heard it; and hence he never hurled it back. With regard to the scenes which took place at the close of the last session, some of the actors in them were not here, and the Congress was defunct. It could not, therefore, be consistent with propriety for this Congress to cast any censure on the past.

Mr. WISE supported the views of Mr. DAWSON, and commented on the effect of the degradation of the character of Congress, in augmenting the power of the Executive. As we fall, said he, the Executive rises; and whilst the President in his anechamber conducted himself as a perfect gentleman, knowing what was due to his high station, I know not what character we may acquire of the galleries, if they were to be judged of by such proceedings as had occurred there.

Did the gentleman from Pennsylvania forget that, in introducing such caricature propositions as the one before them, he was driving the business of the House into the last night of the session, and courting a renewal of scenes of which he, Mr. W. was once obliged, in referring to them, to say that the members were "tired, sleepy, and drunk." Mr. W. considered the motion to be highly disrespectful to the House, and he now put it to the CHAIR whether it was in order for the gentleman to submit it?

The CHAIRMAN [Mr. BANKS] said that that was not a question for the CHAIR to decide. The question was on adopting a preamble to the bill, and that only could be decided on by the House.

Mr. DROMGOOLE appealed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his proposition, and made some observations to show that it could not, with propriety, be adopted.

Mr. PETRIKIN consented to withdraw the proposed preamble.

Mr. SERGEANT moved that the committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to amend by adding an additional section to the bill, changing the ratio of representation so as to allow one Representative to every 75,000 persons.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved to amend the amendment by striking out 75 and inserting 60.

Both the amendments were rejected without a count, and the bill was laid aside to be reported.

The committee then, on motion, took up the Senate bill to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions until the 4th of March, 1842, and to transfer duties from the Navy Department the office of the Commissioner, and also to transfer one clerk.

After a brief conversation on the allowance of the Commissioner,

The committee rose and reported both bills to the House.

In the House the latter bill was taken up; when

Mr. PROFFIT moved to reduce the salary of the commissioner from $3,000 to $2,500, and demanded the yeas and nays.

When, at near 6 o'clock, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, February 21, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted various memorials of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa; which were referred to the appropriate committees.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying the passage of a uniform bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LUMPKIN presented a memorial of Zachariah Williams, and Robert W. Williams, praying for reimbursement of losses sustained by the appropriation of their property to the uses of the army in the late Creek war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred

The petition of Jacob Kerr;

The petition of John Johnston; and made special reports adverse to the several claims, which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred

The memorial of William Morrow;

The petition of Adam Hale; and

The petition of the heirs of John Ireland; made adverse reports thereon; which were severally ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act to amend an act for the appointment of commissioners to adjust the claims to reservations of land under the 14th article of the treaty of 1830, with the Choctaw Indians," reported the same without amendment.

Mr. YOUNG, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of the administrator of Lamech Blanden, deceased; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, in the case of Jubel B. Hancock, was referred back to the committee, with additional documents.

The unfavorable reports on the Secretary's table were taken up and agreed to.

The resolution submitted some days since by Mr. TAPPAN, so to amend the joint rules that no claim which had been twice reported on in either House, adversely, should again be presented, was taken up and discussed by Messrs. TAPPAN, PRENTISS, CALHOUN, DAVIS, LINN, ALLEN, HUBBARD, STRANGE, BUCHANAN, and WALL; when, on motion of the latter, and with the assent of Mr. TAPPAN, it was laid on the table for the present.

The Senate then adjourned till Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, February 21, 1840.

The CHAIR announced that the question immediately pending (in the case of the New Jersey contested election) was on the appeal taken by Mr. ADAMS from the decision of the CHAIR, that it was not in order for the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] to read to the House, on a motion to print, a resolution adopted in the committee, and which had not been reported to the House; and that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BRIGGS] was entitled to the floor on the appeal.

Mr. CASEY prevailed on Mr. BRIGGS to give way to him to introduce a resolution, in effect, that the rule which declares that within a given number of days after the commencement of the session, petitions shall be in order every day, be extended for ten days further.

Mr. FILLMORE (who had the floor on the proposition heretofore introduced by Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, from the Committee of Elections, to have such printing done as might be deemed necessary to facilitate the investigation of the New Jersey contested election, and to which proposition an amendment, offered by Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, was pending) and from which the above appeal originated, claimed his right to the floor, and objected to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. CASEY moved to suspend the rules.

Mr. FILLMORE persisted in his right to the floor.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Illinoise [Mr. CASEY] had the right to make the motion to suspend the rules, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BRIGGS] having yielded him the floor that purpose.

Mr. FILLMORE contended that the gentleman who yielded the floor was not himself entitled to it, inasmuch as the appeal under the 28th rule was not debatable; and on that ground he claimed it.

The SPEAKER said, from the reading of the rule, the gentleman from New York [Mr. F.] was right, and the question would be on the appeal.

Mr. FILLMORE said he would be disposed to yield the floor to any proposition which would not give rise to debate.

Mr. CASEY said his motion could not cause debate, inasmuch as it was one to suspend the rules; which is not debatable.

Mr. VANDERPOEL demanded the yeas and nays on the appeal.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved a call of the House; on which

Mr. GRANGER demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 72, nays 96.

So the House refused the motion for a call.

The question was then taken on the appeal, viz. "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House?" and decided, by yeas and nays, in the affirmative—yeas 99, nays 83.

So the decision of the CHAIR was sustained, viz. that Mr. FILLMORE could not read the resolution passed in committee without leave of the House first had.

Mr. RUSSELL appealed to Mr. FILLMORE to allow him to move a resolution for the postponement of the present subject, and for the reception of reports from committees during the residue of the morning hour.

Mr. FILLMORE declined yielding the floor.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON expressed a wish to modify his amendment in reference to the printing of papers before the Committee of Elections.

Mr. FILLMORE would not give way for either of the propositions; when

Mr. JOHNSON said Mr. F. had been called to order, and had taken his seat; an appeal from the decision of the CHAIR that he was out of order had not been sustained, and therefore he could not, by the rules, proceed, if any member objected.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected to Mr. FILLMORE's proceeding.

Mr. FILLMORE contended that the rule referred to applied only to cases where a member had been called to order for words spoken; he had been guilty of no violation of order; he had begun to read a paper which he supposed he had a right to read; it had been decided that he could not read the paper without leave; he had abandoned the reading of the paper; and now was he to be told that he had lost his right to address the House? He trusted they had not yet reached quite such a state of despotism as that.

Mr. PETRIKIN again interposed objection to his proceeding without permission of the House.

The CHAIR said the gentleman could not proceed, and ordered the 28th rule to be read to sustain his opinion, as follows:

"If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order; in which case, the member so called to order shall immediately sit down, unless permitted to explain; and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case, but without debate: if there be no appeal, the decision of the Chair shall be submitted to. If the decision be in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise, he shall not be permitted to proceed, in case any member object, without leave of the House; and, if the case require it, he shall be liable to the censure of the House."

Mr. FILLMORE asked permission to explain the situation of the question upon which he was called to order. He was called to order on the ground that he was reading a resolution adopted in committee; the SPEAKER decided that he was out of order in doing so, and the House had sustained the SPEAKER in that decision. No objection was raised to his discussing the proceedings of the committee as a body, and therefore he had the right to proceed in his remarks, notwithstanding the House had decided that he should not read the particular resolution. He was understood further to say, that the gentleman who had preceded him, [Mr. CAMPBELL, chairman of the Committee of Elections,] had referred to the votes of the committee, and he was a member of the same committee, and wanted the same privilege of alluding to the proceedings of the committee in general terms.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina understood that the gentleman had stated that he had alluded to individual votes in the committee. He had not done so, but merely to his own course.

Mr. FILLMORE. Then if the gentleman could allude to his own course, he had also the right to refer to the course of others. He, as a member of the committee, only claimed the same right to discuss the subject in general terms.

Mr. RIVES hoped the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PETRIKIN] would withdraw his objection, and that the gentleman might be permitted to proceed in his remarks.

Mr. FILLMORE inquired of the CHAIR whether he could proceed.

The CHAIR said he could not, from his construction of the 28th rule, except by permission of the House.

Mr. BELL objected to the construction the SPEAKER had given the rule, and said that it was not properly applied to this case, and contended that the gentleman from New York had not violated the rule, and that, by the decision of the House, which had refused him the right to read the resolution, it had prevented him from violating it. He considered it a most arbitrary application of the rule; and, if the decision of the CHAIR were sustained, it would destroy the freedom of debate, and prevent gentlemen from presenting their views to the House at all, except by the will of a majority. The 28th rule had no manner of application, and appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. FILLMORE demanded the yeas and nays on the appeal; which were ordered.

Mr. BRIGGS made some remarks, which were not heard.

Mr. HAND contended that the motion which he made, that his colleague have leave to proceed, was the proper motion before the House.

Mr. FILLMORE replied he would never submit his right to be heard on that floor, and the rights of his constituents, to the vote of a majority. He spoke by right and not by permission.

The morning hour having expired, Mr. RUSSELL moved that the House proceed to the orders of the day.

On this motion the yeas and nays were demanded by Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, and were ordered.

Mr. EVANS said, by the rules, the House must go to the orders of the day, which was the private business on the SPEAKER's table, and any motion was unnecessary.

The question being taken, the yeas were 91, the nays 102: so the House refused to pass to the orders of the day.

Mr. TILLINGHAST had risen, and was about to address the House, as the Reporter understood, on the resolution to print, when

Mr. RICE GARLAND rose to order, and insisted that as Friday and Saturday were set apart for the consideration of private bills, and private business exclusively, to go on with the debate on a resolution involved a change of the order of business, and could not be done but by a vote of two-thirds.

The CHAIR so deciding,

Mr. HOLLEMAN took an appeal.

The question was debated for a long time by Messrs. GARLAND, CUSHING, CAVE JOHNSON, MARVIN, CLIFFORD, BRIGGS, DROMGOOLE, EVANS, TURNEY, HOLLEMAN, and TILLINGHAST, when

Mr. TURNEY moved the previous question, which being seconded, put, and carried, and the main question being "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House?" it was decided by yeas and nays, as follows: yeas 113, nays 64.

So the decision of the CHAIR was sustained.

A number of private bills on the Speaker's table were then taken up on their first and second reading, and referred to the appropriate committees.

On motion of Mr. CHAPMAN of Iowa, the bill for the relief of James M. Morgan, together with a memorial for the pay of the militia of Iowa, called out to repel invasion by the State of Missouri, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, it was resolved that when this House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Some struggle then ensued (there being no private business yet on the calendar) to proceed to the consideration of various kinds of business.

After which, on motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the rules were suspended for the purpose of taking up the act amending the act in relation to the census, which had been reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with certain amendments, which were concurred in; and the bill having been ordered to a third reading at this time, was read a third time, and passed.

The House then took up the bill providing for the reappointment of the Commissioner of Pensions, and which said bill had been reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with an amendment (offered by Mr. PROFFIT) reducing the salary of the said Commissioner from $3,000 to $2,500 per annum.

After some further remarks from Mr. PROFFIT, the amendment was debated by Messrs. GRAVES, GIDDINGS, and W. THOMPSON, at much length, and in favor thereof.

Mr. SMITH of Maine replied at some length to Mr. GRAVES—which will be published hereafter. When Mr. S. was about concluding, several gentleman (some twenty or thirty) rose and claimed the floor, as having first addressed the Speaker.

The SPEAKER said that a number of gentleman had addressed the Chair at once, and before the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMITH] had actually concluded his remarks; and that, if gentlemen would be seated, and take a fair start, he would decide who had the floor.

The SPEAKER then gave the floor to Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky, who spoke in favor of the amendment, and had not concluded, when he gave way to a motion for adjournment, which prevailed.

And the House adjourned until 12 o'clock on Monday next.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, February 24, 1840.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of three hundred and twenty-three inhabitants of the city of New York, being persons engaged in the manufacture of umbrellas, parasols, and the like. This petition states that, up to the year 1839, an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent. had been imposed upon umbrellas and parasols, and in conformity, as the petitioners believe, with the true construction, as well as with the spirit and intent, of the compromise act; that a judicial construction was given to this act in the year 1839, which admits the importation of these articles free of duty, as manufactures of silk, or of which silk is a component material of chief value; and that, in consequence of this construction of the law, the business of the petitioners is threatened with entire ruin, as they are compelled by the law to pay a duty upon all the articles which enter into the manufacture, except the silk, while the foreign umbrella, or parasol, entire, is imported free of duty. They pray relief by the reimposition of the duty of 25 per cent. upon imported umbrellas and parasols, thus repealed by the construction of the courts.

Mr. W. said that he believed, according to the usual classification of business in the Senate, this petition should go to the Committee on Manufactures; but as a great number of petitions of a kindred character had been, during the present session, referred to the Committee on Finance, he would move the reference of this to that committee, unless some Senator should prefer the other direction. It was proper, however, whether the reference should be to the one committee or the other, that the petitioners should know that, inasmuch as any bill for their relief must necessarily be a bill to raise revenue, it cannot originate in this body, and that nothing can be done here with this petition, or the many which have been presented, praying the imposition of a duty, and an increase of duty, upon importations of silk, other than to follow the action of the House of Representatives.

The petition was then referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT presented, also, a petition signed by Charles Mills and 220 other citizens of the city of New York, and a similar petition signed by E. W. and F. Tryan and 230 others, also citizens of New York, praying Congress to exercise its constitutional power in the passage of uniform laws, for cases of bankruptcy, throughout the United States. Mr. W. said he would make the same motion in relation to these petitions, which he had made in reference to the great number of a similar character, which it had been his duty and his pleasure to present from his immediate constituents, during the present session, viz: That the reading be dispensed with, and they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and he would avail himself of the occasion, most respectfully to express the hope that that important committee would at their earliest convenience, give to the wishes of these numerous and respectable petitioners, their careful and favorable consideration.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a memorial similar to the foregoing, and went somewhat at length into an argument in favor of the passage of a general bankrupt law: and submitted the following as an outline of the proposed law:

1. That the circumstances of the country require that Congress should exercise its constitutional power of establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

2. That it should be made applicable to all persons whatever, owing debts not less in amount than ——— dollars, who shall avow their insolvency, and, by petition to the proper tribunal, pray for the benefit of the act. These shall be deemed voluntary bankrupts.

3. That it should apply compulsorily to merchants and traders whose debts to one or more creditors shall amount to a sum not less than ——— dollars, and who have or shall fail in business, or be apparently insolvent, or unable to pay their debts. Such persons to be deemed involuntary bankrupts, and to be subject to the provisions of the act upon the petition of any creditor or creditors whose debts together exceed the sum of ——— dollars.

4. No voluntary or involuntary bankrupt to be entitled to a discharge, who shall, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and intending to take the benefit of the act, knowingly give any preference, by any payments or transfer of property, to any one or more of his creditors, to the exclusion of his creditors generally.

5. Every bankrupt surrendering all his property and rights of property, for the benefit of his creditors, and conforming to all other requisitions of the act, shall be entitled to a full discharge from all his debts, and shall receive a certificate of discharge from the proper tribunal. But if he is guilty of any fraud or concealment in respect to his property, he shall not be entitled to any certificate; or if granted, it shall be avoided on proof of such fraud.

6. All creditors coming in and proving their debts under the bankruptcy to be bona fide debts, to share in the bankrupt's property and effects, pro rata, without any preference or priority except debts to the United States, which are first to be paid.

7. The district and circuit courts to have concurrent jurisdiction in all matters of bankruptcy, to be exercised summarily; and for this purpose the said courts to be deemed always opened.

8. One commissioner only to be appointed in any one case, to act in bankruptcy, on the proof of debts, &c. and one assignee only, to collect and administer the bankrupt's effects. The commissioner and assignee to be appointed in each case, by the court, and subject at all times to its orders, in all things touching their duties, and the sale and distribution of the effects.

9. The proceedings in each case to be finally closed within two years from the time of the bankruptcy, except as to matters which may be then pending, in law and equity; but the pendency of any such suits in law or equity is not to suspend the general proceedings in the case, nor postpone distribution and settlement so far as they can be made.

10. All suits by, against, or concerning, bankrupts, to be brought within two years after the bankruptcy, and not afterwards; except on causes of action which shall not then have arisen. But all debts, not payable till a future day, may be proved in the bankruptcy, and paid pro rata, with proper abatement for interest or discount.

11. Any person proceeded against as an involuntary bankrupt, to be entitled, at his election, to trial by jury, to ascertain the fact of such bankruptcy.

12. No person to be entitled to a discharge, who shall be proved to have lost, within —— years before his bankruptcy, by any gaming, wasing, or betting of any kind, whether at one or more times, the sum of —— dollars.

13. The circuit court in each district to establish a rate of fees for the officers of the circuit court and district court, in all cases in bankruptcy; and those rates to be published.

14. The act to continue in force five years, and until the then next session of Congress.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he rose to make a suggestion to the Senator from Massachusetts and to the members of the Judiciary Committee on this important subject, which he hoped they would take into serious consideration in framing a bankrupt bill. In the session of 1821, '2—the session in which he first entered the House of Representatives—there was a bankrupt bill before that body, which was extensively discussed. At the first, his impressions were favorable to its passage; but they had undergone a change before question was finally taken, and he had made a speech, and voted against the adoption of that measure. This change was produced by the arguments of a distinguished member from South Carolina, (Mr. Lowndes,) now no more, who, in his estimation, possessed more political information and better matured practical wisdom, than any other statesman he had ever known. Mr. Lowndes was then in a state of such feeble health that he had not physical strength sufficient to enable him to present his views at large to the House, though, according to his best recollection, he had made the attempt, and was obliged to desist. He had, however, conversed with him freely upon the subject.

His chief objection to the bill then before the House, according to Mr. B's best recollection, was that the bankrupt law of England was not at all applicable to this country. That from the extent of the United States, and the few Federal courts which existed, it must in practice prove an intolerable burden to the people. That all the judicial business involved in the settlement of a bankrupt estate, must necessarily be drawn into these courts, and they were at such a distance from a large proportion of the people, that the attendance of parties, jurors, and witnesses, upon them, would be exceedingly oppressive. And that the difficulties thus imposed to the attainment of justice, would prevent justice from being done in the settlement of bankrupts' estates. These points Mr. B. had attempted to enforce in the remarks which he had made in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Lowndes strongly entertained the opinion that a bankrupt law, founded upon the principles of the civil law, would be made more applicable to this country than the English bankrupt system. He was in favor of a cessio bonorum—a voluntary assignment by the bankrupt of his effects, in trust for the benefit of all his creditors; and then if a large majority of these creditors in number and value, believed that he had acted honestly, and were willing to release him, this should be binding upon the minority. Such a law would in a great degree execute itself, and would relieve the community from the cumbrous and distant machinery of the Federal courts.

He merely threw out these suggestions from memory, which, after so long a lapse of time, might be imperfect.

The remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts were entitled to grave attention. He should give the subject all the impartial consideration which its importance demanded; and he would say in advance, that if his opinions should undergo a change, and it was very possible they might, he would not be deterred from changing his vote for the sake of preserving his character from the imputation of inconsistency. He trusted that the bill which might now be presented, would be much more simple in its form, and direct in its provisions, than the bill against which he had formerly voted.

Mr. TALLMADGE also presented a memorial on the subject of a bankrupt law; which, after some remarks in favor of the object of the petitioners, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALL said he would make a remark or two in reply to the suggestions of the gentleman who had spoken on this subject. He was deeply impressed with its importance, and thought that the time had arrived when Congress should perform their constitutional obligations in regard to it. The committee had not been unmindful of their duty, but would in a short time give Senators an opportunity of making known their views on the subject.

Mr. FULTON presented the memorial of certain citizens of Arkansas, praying to be allowed to locate a quantity of land, to be applied to the purposes of education; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. YOUNG presented the memorial of the Galena Chamber of Commerce of the State of Illinois, praying that Galena may be made a port of entry and delivery; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented the petition of the heirs of John Scraggs and James Scraggs; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. BETTS presented the petition of James Rhinehart; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a memorial remonstrating against the use of bloodhounds in the Florida war; which was laid on the table.

Mr. DAVIS presented the memorial of Thomas Rhodes and others, praying for the establishment of a Congress of Nations; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Cumberland county, Maine, praying for a similar object as the foregoing; which was referred to the same committee.

Mr. MERRICK presented the memorial of the Mayor, Recorder, and Common Council of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, praying an extension of their charter on the subject of taxation; a renewal of the charter of the Farmer's and Mechanic's Bank of Georgetown; the erection of a permanent stone bridge across Rock Creek at the western extremity of Pennsylvania avenue; remonstrating against any further obstructions to their commerce on the Potomac river; and the establishment of a fund for the purposes of education in the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. M. also presented the petition of the widow of Samuel Walker, deceased, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STURGEON presented three memorials of citizens of Philadelphia, severally praying an appropriation for the erection of a new custom-house at that place; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STURGEON presented five petitions of citizens of Alleghany county, Pa. praying for the abolition of the slave trade. The motion to receive was,

On motion by Mr. FULTON, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PRENTISS presented the memorial of A. Partridge and others, in behalf of the Military Convention assembled at Norwich, Vt.; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented the memorial of Chauncey Hall, representing certain defects in the law authorizing the issuing of patents, and praying that a patent may issue in his favor for the discovery of a process by which cast iron may be tempered; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

On motion by Mr. LUMPKIN, five memorials, which were heretofore referred to the Committee on Manufactures, were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the petition of William Walker, made an adverse report thereon.

Mr. BUCHANAN offered the following resolution for the consideration of the Senate:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the expediency of proposing to the States such an amendment to the Federal Constitution as will secure a large specie basis for the circulation of the country, by prohibiting the issue and circulation of bank notes, and other paper currency, of denominations so low as to prevent the circulation of gold and silver in the ordinary transactions of business, and in payment of the wages of labor.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GARLAND, their Clerk, announcing that the House had passed the bill to amend the act to provide for taking the sixth census, with an amendment. [The amendment was to reduce the salary of the principal clerk from two thousand to fifteen hundred dollars.]

On motion by Mr. WALL, the bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SPECIAL ORDER.

The resolution from the Select Committee on the assumption of the debts of the States was then taken up, and Mr. PHELPS addressed the Senate at length on the subject.

On motion by Mr. CRITTENDEN, the subject was then passed over informally.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Madame De Lusser and their legal representatives, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Juan Belgar;

The bill for the relief of Daniel Marsaque;

The bill for the relief of Joseph Bogy;

The bill for the relief of Sebastian Butcher, and the heirs or legal representatives of Bartholomew Butcher, Michael Butcher, and Peter Bloom; and were severally taken up as in Committee of the Whole, considered, and ordered to be engrossed.

The bill to settle the title to certain tracts of land in the State of Arkansas;

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to amend the act to provide for taking the sixth census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, approved March 3, 1839, reported the same to the Senate, with a recommendation that the amendment of the House be not concurred in.

After some remarks from Messrs. DAVIS and PRESTON in opposition to the motion of Mr. WALL,

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he thought that fifteen hundred dollars was an ample compensation for the services required under the provisions of this act. He was glad to hear the remarks in favor of retrenchment and economy coming from the quarter they did, and he could assure the gentlemen they should have his support, and he would go hand in hand with them in all their measures for this object. He hoped that the amendment of the House would be concurred in.

Mr. TAPPAN said that as the office was but a temporary one, we should take that fact into consideration when determining what would be a proper amount of compensation. He thought that if they could get a competent person to perform these services for fifteen hundred dollars, they would not be justified in giving a greater sum.

Mr. WALL said that his ideas of economy were probably different from those of other gentlemen. He was willing to pay talent and industry, when engaged in our service, a fair compensation. When he began to economize, he would not do it by subtracting a small amount from the pittance paid to our clerks for the labor they perform. We would, to be sure, put the few cents saved in this manner into the Treasury, and it might form a subject of boasting to some Senators for their great exertions in favor of economy; but, for himself, he could take neither pride nor satisfaction in the reflection of having participated in it.

After some further remarks from Messrs. KING and WHITE, the question was taken on concurring with the amendment of the House, and it was decided in the affirmative, ayes 27, noes 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Spence, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, White, and Williams—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Strange, Wall, and Wright—6.

So the amendment of the House was consented in;

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, February 24, 1840.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications, viz:

A communication from the Treasury Department, enclosing a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, covering a report from the Register and Receiver of the Land Office at St. Augustine, under the law of the 26th May, 1830, in relation to certain Spanish claims. On motion of Mr. CASEY, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report in answer to a resolution of the House calling for information in relation to certain expenses of the Wisconsin Territory for the years 1837, '38, and '39. On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

A communication for the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in compliance with a resolution of the House, adopted on the 10th instnnt, showing the probable quantity and value of the public lands of the United States, lying within the geographical limits of the State of Tennessee, accompanied by a communication from the Secretary of State of the State of Teunessee. On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Report from the First Comptroller, in compliance with the act of 3d March, 1809, presenting a statement of the accounts which have remained more than three years unsettled, and on which balances are due. On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL wished, before the States were called for resolutions, to have the privilege to report one from the Committee of Elections; which was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be authorized to send for persons and papers in reference to the contested elections from the Third Congressional District of Pennsylvania, and the Sixth Congressional District of Massachusetts.

Mr. DAVIS of Pennsylvania objected to its reception.

Mr. RIVES said it was impossible for the committee to proceed with the investigation of these cases, without the power is given to it. The committee is now doing nothing, for the want of this power.

Mr. J. CAMPBELL moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer the resolution.

Mr. KEIM inquired of the chairman of the Committee of Elections, Mr. CAMPBELL, if he supposed this resolution gave the committee power to appoint commissioners to take testimony.

Mr. CAMPBELL said the committee had had that subject under consideration, and had come to the conclusion it would be better to submit the question to the House.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and it was carried without a division.

The question then arose on the adoption of the resolution, when

Mr. BIDDLE said that he understood that objection was made to the appointment of commissioners by the committee. Now the resolution, he supposed, merely authorized the examination of testimony by the committee itself. He wished to hear the resolution read, that he might be certain on this point.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina said that the usual course had been for the contesting parties to be at the trouble and expense of taking testimony under the laws of the States where the contested elections had been held. He objected to the giving this power to the committee, on account of the great expense that might be incurred in consequence of it. The committee, he said, might, under this power, send for every voter in the contested districts, and bring them here to testify.

Mr. VANDERPOEL asked if the committee could not delegate the power to some persons in the States of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, to take depositions for them. The expense would be very considerable if all the witnesses were to be brought here.

Mr. CAMPBELL had no sort of objection to modifying his resolution so as to put in the words "and to examine witnesses by commission;" and the resolution being thus modified, was read.

Mr. R. GARLAND thought the modification unnecessary. He was on the Committee of Elections of 1837, and they were told by the Speaker that the power to send for persons and papers gave them the whole power of taking testimony by commission.

Mr. FILLMORE said it did seem to him that a little consideration ought to be given to a grave subject like this. It would be recollected that the House was, in these cases, exercising judicial powers, and he believed it was not the habit of any of our courts to delegate their powers. It struck him that this power should be exercised by the House only, and not by a committee. He had no objection to giving the power in this particular instance, but it was the establishment of the precedent that he objected to.

Mr. BIDDLE believed that the usual course in cases of contested elections, was for the parties themselves to name the commissioners. How was the committee to get their information, so as to make a proper designation of the commissioners? Would they not get their information from one of the candidates; and if so, was it not likely that the power thus exercised would be prejudicial to the other? Knowing the passions and prejudices that would be brought to bear, he was unwilling to give the committee this power.

Mr. BROWN of Tennessee observed that the committee having entered into an examination of the Massachusetts and Pennsylvania cases, found that their powers were inadequate to the attainment of the requisite testimony, and their investigations being thus suspended, they came before the House and asked for the necessary and ordinary power to send for persons and papers. We have, said Mr. B., heard enough of these cases to know that we cannot progress with them without having the facility of taking depositions, in the respective neighborhoods where the elections have been held. It seemed that one of the principal objections to the giving of this power to the committee, of issuing commissions, was that it might be abused. Now, he would suggest to the House, that this difficulty might be removed by giving the appointment of the commissioners to the Speaker; for it would seem to him, that it would make very little difference whether they were appointed by the Speaker or the House. He hoped the resolution offered by the chairman would be adopted, and that the House would not take any alarm at giving a power to the committee, which had often been given before, and which never had been abused

Mr. PARMENTER remarked, that one of these cases [the Massachusetts one,] was somewhat different from the ordinary cases which came before the House. The grounds taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE,] were, that it was the duty of the competitors in cases of contested elections, to designate the commissioners and to collect the testimony. He would remark that in the Massachusetts case there was no competitor contesting the seat of the sitting member. The law of that State required that the Representative elected to Congress should have a majority of all the votes given, and it was the people of the ninth election district in that State, who set forth in their petition that the gentleman claiming to represent them did not receive a majority of their votes according to law. Now it followed, that if the doctrine of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was sustained by the House, there would be no one in that district to designate the commissioner, or collect the testimony. It could not be expected that the trouble and expense involved would be borne by any particular individual.

Mr. PETRIKIN here moved the previous question, which was refused—ayes 77, noes 83.

Mr. TOLAND then moved to postpone the resolution till to-morrow.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina said it appeared from the testimony of gentlemen who had been long members of the House, that the power to send for persons and papers carried with it the power to appoint commissioners for taking testimony. Such was also the opinion of the committee; but to obviate objections that had been made, he had modified his resolution, so as to get the sanction of the House to the power of appointing commissioners. The first proposition was merely for the usual power of sending for persons and papers; and without this power the committee could not move one step. For the purpose of getting a direct vote of the House on the proposition as first offered, he would withdraw the modification, and then the question would simply be on giving the committee power to send for persons and papers.

Mr BOND desired to know of the chairman of the committee in what event they contemplated the necessity of sending for persons and papers. He understood that it had not been usual in the case of contested elections to bring witnesses to the Capitol for the purpose of taking their testimony. He knew that, in the case of Letcher and Moore, the parties were sent home, and that months elapsed before they returned with their testimony. We know also (said he) that, in the New Jersey case, the committee have sent home the parties to take testimony. Now he wanted to know what it was in the Pennsylvania and Massachusetts cases that made it necessary for the committee to have this power.

Mr. CAMPBELL stated that, when there were not a great number of witnesses to examine, so as not to occupy much time and involve a heavy expense, it was deemed the most satisfactory course to have the witnesses examined by the committee; but when, from their distance from the seat of Government, and the number to be examined, a more than ordinary consumption of time and money would be involved, it would be better to have their depositions taken by a commissioner appointed for that purpose.

Mr. BOND said, that, in the estimation of some gentlemen, that would be considered a great number, which, in the estimation of others, would be considered a small one. He thought there was no necessity for the adoption of the resolution, and that it would be opening the door for a heavy expense to the Government. It would also be a departure from the established usage of the House.

Mr. GRAHAM, after calling for the reading of the resolution, observed that he saw no necessity for its passage. It would be, in his opinion, the setting a bad precedent, for he never was aware of such a power having been granted to a Committee of Elections. With regard to the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. PARMENTER,] he saw no force in them; for, if the people of the district would not take the trouble to collect the evidence necessary to support their petition, it would be considered that they did not take much interest in it. He thought that all the committee could or ought to do, was to prescribe the regulations for taking testimony, and leave the contesting parties to do it. If there were laws in the States where the depositions were to be taken, providing regulations for taking them, they could be taken under those laws: but if there were not, the committee had the power of prescribing all the necessary regulations.

Mr. RIVES observed that it seemed that no matter in what shape the subject was presented here, the committee would have difficulties to encounter. If, said he, we ask for power to have depositions taken, it is objected to as giving the committee too much power. If, on the other hand, said he, we ask for authority to send for persons and papers, for the purpose of taking testimony here, this is also objected to for the same reasons. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GRAHAM] says this is unprecedented. The gentleman spoke without a sufficient examination. In nine cases out of ten of contested elections, Mr. R. said, this power had been given. Why were these objections made? Did gentlemen desire a thorough examination into these contested cases? If they did, why object to giving the committee this power? The gentleman from North Carolina says that it is the duty of the people of the contested district in Massachusetts to furnish testimony to the House. Did they know what sort of testimony the House required? Did they know that certified copies of the poll books were wanted to ascertain whether their Representative had received a majority of the votes according to law? But it was objected that the power to send for persons and papers would involve a very heavy expense, and bring a vast number of persons to Washington. Now there might be persons here in this city by whom material facts might be established in relation to these cases, and why not let the committee have these persons before them? But suppose they are not in the city, why not let the committee send to the States for them? Were gentlemen so afraid of expense that they are willing to prevent justice from being done? If they were in favor of a fair investigation into these cases, they ought to give the committee power to collect testimony. They ought not to object to the committee having such evidence before them as would lead to a fair and impartial examination. The object of the committee was not to do any thing that they had not the right to do. They would not send for persons and papers unless the House gave them that power; and unless the House did give it to them they could not proceed one step in their investigations, for they were now doing nothing for the want of it. The power had been conferred on them in the New Jersey case, but not in the Massachusetts and Pennsylvania cases. It was a power usually given to the Committee of Elections. It had not heretofore been refused, and if it was refused now, it would be equivalent to saying that the House did not want a thorough investigation into these cases. Mr. R. concluded by moving the previous question.

Mr. BIDDLE asked if the main question would not be on the motion to postpone the resolution till to-morrow.

Mr. BANKS said the main question would be on the resolution, the previous question cutting off the motion to postpone.

Mr. BRIGGS said the previous question cuts off amendments; but this was not an amendment, but a motion to postpone.

The SPEAKER said the rule applied to a motion to postpone as well as to amend; and the question, therefore, would be on the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Tennessee desired, before the question was taken, to read the law on which the practice of the House, in relation to this question, was founded; but was ruled to be out of order.

Mr. RIVES having called for tellers, Messrs. RAMSEY of Pennsylvania and BRIGGS of Massachusetts were appointed, and the question on seconding the call for the previous question, was taken, when the tellers reported, ayes 94, noes 62.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina called for the yeas and nays on the preliminary question "shall the main question be now taken, which were ordered; and on calling the roll resulted—yeas 124, nays 74, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, J. Allen, H. J. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, S. H. Butler, Bynum, John Campbell, W. B. Campbell, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Clifford, Coles, Connor, M. A. Cooper, Craig, Crockett, Cross, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Wagner, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—74.

Mr. REED called for a division of the main question, so as to take it first on that part relating to the Pennsylvania case, and afterwards on that part relating to the Massachusetts, case.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, and RICE GARLAND, expressed their doubts whether the question was divisible; but

The SPEAKER deciding that it was,

The question was first taken on given the Committee power to send to Pennsylvania for persons and papers, and resulted—yeas 136, nays 50, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson, Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, Bynum, Calhoun, J. Wagner, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and Sherrod Williams—50.

The question was then taken on the second branch of the resolution, allowing the committee to send for persons and papers in the Massachusetts case, and resulted—yeas 106, nays 56, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, H. J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Burke, William O. Butler, Calhoun, John Campbell, William B. Mr. JONES of Virginia said he had been instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House will, on Thursday, at 1 o'clock, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to consider House bill number 18, providing for the issuing of Treasury notes—that it be made the special order at that hour, and at the same hour on each succeeding day, until the bill be finally disposed of, to take precedence of all other business.

The SPEAKER said that the first business in order was the call of the States for resolutions, and that the gentleman from Virginia could only offer his resolution by general consent.

Objection being made—

Mr. JONES moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to offer the resolution; and upon that motion,

Mr. L. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 103, nays 80, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Biddle, Blackwell, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. S. Hastings, Hawes, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, Wm. Cost Johnson, Kempshall, King, Lincoln, Mason, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Pope, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Sherrod Williams 80.

So (there not being two-thirds in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

The SPEAKER then called for resolutions, commencing in the reverse order of the States and Territories.

In the process of this business,

Mr. FILLMORE raised the point of order, that, under the rule, no member could offer more than one resolution, or one series of resolutions, all relating to the same subject, at one time, except on leave given.

The SPEAKER was of opinion, he said, that that rule applied only to the morning hour.

Mr. EVANS suggested that the practice at the last Congress had been the other way.

The SPEAKER said he would, then, conform to that practice.

Mr. CASEY, on the State of Illinois being called, offered a resolution providing that the time for the presentation of petitions and memorials be extended and continued for four days from and after the 25th inst.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said he felt constrained to object.

And, as the resolution, giving rise to debate, must, under the rule, have been laid over,

Mr. CASEY moved a suspension of the rule.

On which motion, Mr. JONES of Virginia demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. LINCOLN rose to inquire of the CHAIR whether, if the resolution was agreed to, the effect would be to continue the discussion on the Cumberland road? (This subject, it will be recollected, came up originally in the form of a memorial.)

The SPEAKER said he was of opinion it would.

And the question was then taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 104, nays 62.

So, there not being two-thirds, the rule was not suspended.

In pursuance of notice heretofore given, Mr. STUART of Illinois asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill granting preemption rights to actual settlers on the public lands; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RARIDEN (leave having been denied) moved a suspension of the rule for the purpose of taking up and considering the resolution, heretofore offered by him, calling upon the Secretary of War for information in relation to the disbursements of Indian annuities, and the amount of salaries paid the agents for that purpose, &c.

Mr. PROFFIT asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

And, after some conversation on a point of order, the question was taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 79, nays 86.

So the rule was not suspended.

On the State of Kentucky being called,

Mr. GRAVES (leave having been denied) moved a suspension of the rule for the purpose of taking up and considering the resolution offered by him the other day, proposing an investigation, by the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, in the case of Mr. Robinson, formerly a clerk in that Department.

But the House refused to suspend the rule.

It being now after 4 o'clock, Mr. REYNOLDS moved an adjournment; which motion prevailed.

And the House adjourned.

RESOLUTIONS.

On motion of Mr. MILLER,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing, by law, a line of four-horse post coaches, for carrying the mail twice a week on the following post roads in the State of Missouri, viz.—From Hannibal, on the Mississippi river, in Marion county, through Palmyra, the seat of justice of said county; through Paris, the seat of justice of Monroe county; Huntsville, the seat of justice of Randolph county; and Fayette, the seat of justice of Howard county; to Boonville, on the Missouri river, the seat of justice of Cooper county: and for carrying the mail in two-horse coaches twice a week from Boonville, in Cooper county, through Georgetown, the seat of justice of Pettis county; Warsaw, the seat of justice of Benton county; Bolivar, the seat of justice of Polk county; Springfield, the seat of justice of Green county; and through the seats of justice of Berry and Newton counties, in Missouri; to Fayetteville, the seat of justice of Washington county, in the State of Arkansas.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a line of two-horse coaches, for carrying the mail twice a week on the post roads from Jefferson city, Missouri, through Versailles, the seat of justice of Morgan county, to Warsaw, the seat of justice of Benton county, in said State.

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting an adequate appropriation for continuing the improvement of the Harbor at St. Louis, Missouri.

On motion of Mr. JOSEPH L. WILLIAMS,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire into the expediency of giving circuit court jurisdiction to the District Court of the United States for the District of Eastern Tennessee.

On motion of Mr. CROSS,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the plan adopted, or proposed to be adopted, by him for the defence of the Western frontier, commencing on the Gulf of Mexico and extending to the southwest corner of Missouri; what forts have been erected, their location along or near said frontier, the number of troops at each, and what roads connecting with or leading to those on the frontier of Arkansas have been constructed, are in progress, or would be useful, from the interior of said State, or the Mississippi river, on its eastern boundary. Also, what tribes of Indians, and the number of warriors belonging to each, own or inhabit the country immediately west of the said States of Missouri and Arkansas, distinguishing between those removed there by the Government of the United States, and such as occupied the country prior to such removal; whether there be any navigable and what rivers leading to, and, in his judgment, immediately connected with the defence of said frontier; and what would be the probable cost of the construction and completion of the roads, the repair and erection of forts, and the improvement of the navigation of rivers, respectively, deemed material to carry into effect the said plan of defence.

On motion of Mr. CHAPMAN of Iowa,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War communicate to this House such information as he may be possessed of relative to the causes requiring troops to guard the payments of annuities to Indians on the Des Moines river; whether such necessity, if it does exist, has not arisen from the fraudulent influence exercised by traders over the Indian agents; and whether the furnishing troops was not requested by the agent.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands inquire into the expediency of granting land for a deaf and dumb asylum, in the Territory of Iowa.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War communicate to the House, whether the Iowa militia has been called out under the authority of the United States; and whether an appropriation is necessary to enable him to defray the expense, and if so what probable amount.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Territory of Iowa to reclaim inundated lands for school purposes.

On motion of Mr. DOWNING,

Resolved, That the preamble and resolutions of sundry citizens of the Territory of Florida assembled in town meetings at Tallahassee and Monticello, be referred to the Committee on Territories; and that they be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so modifying the organic laws of the several Territories of the United States, as to authorize the people of each Territory to elect its own Governor; and, also, to inquire and report the best mode of regulating by law the manner in which all the officers of said Territories (Executive and Judicial) shall be chosen.

On motion of Mr. CROSS, of Arkansas.

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to continue the military road heretofore commenced from White river, in Izard county, Arkansas, to Fort Wayne, near the western boundary of said State.

On motion of Mr. CROCKETT,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Brownsville, in the State of Tennessee, to Somerville, in said State.

On motion of Mr. W. B. CAMPBELL,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs inquire into the expediency of providing for the payment of the staff of the Governor of the State of Tennessee, while engaged in organizing and mustering the volunteers of said State, called into the service of the United States in the year 1838, for the Cherokee service.

On motion of Mr. A. V. BROWN,

Whereas the state of our Indian relations renders it highly probable that, for several years to come, the United States may have to rely much on the services of its volunteer militia, therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire into the propriety of increasing the pay of all volunteers, both privates and officers, who may hereafter be called into the service of the United States, and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr DUNCAN,

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing compensation to William D. Jones, esq. for extra services while Consul for the United States at Mexico, and during the absence of our accredited Minister at that Court; and that his letter to Mr Duncan, one of the members of this House, be referred to said committee.

On motion of Mr. GRAVES,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the propriety of so adjusting the circuits of the different judges of the Supreme Court, as to equalize, as far as practicable, the labors performed by each.

On motion of Mr. TURNEY,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from McMinnville, Tennessee, to Smith's, in said State.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD,

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of paying the claims of John W. Read, esq. for certain services rendered the United States.

On motion of Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Hickory Level, in Talladega county, to Adair's Ferry, on Tallapoosa Abacooch-y Gold Mines, in Randolph county, thence to the gold mines in Carroll county, Georgia, and thence to Campbelltown, in said State.

On motion of Mr. GRAVES,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the propriety of making appropriations to improve the harbor at Louisville, Kentucky, and to relieve the commerce of the Ohio river from the onerous burdens that are imposed upon them by the Louisville and Portland canal, either by deepening the main channel over the falls, or by such other means as to them shall seem expedient.

On motion of Mr. MEDILL,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from the city of Chillicothe, through the towns of Hallsville, Adelphia, and Perry, to Logan, in Hocking county, Ohio; and also of so changing the present route from Jackson, in Jackson county, to Nelsonville, in Athens county, as to pass by McArthurstown, Judge Johnson's corner, Star post office, and Logan, in the said county of Hocking.

On motion of Mr. BOND,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of equalizing the salary of the district judge of the United States, in the State of Ohio, with the salaries of the district judges in the several other States.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of dispensing with the present land offices at Marietta, Steubenville, and Wooster, in the State of Ohio, and attaching those districts to the Louisville land district, in said State.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAN,

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be instructed to inquire into the expediency of dispensing with making of pens for the House of Representatives; and that they also inquire into the expediency of retrenching the contingent expenses of the House generally.

On motion of Mr. CHINN,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be required to inform this House as soon as practicable, why no patents have been issued to the claimants to, or purchasers of, lands in the St. Helena or Greensburg district, in the State of Louisiana, together with copies of all the correspondence between the Commissioner of the General Land office and the Surveyor General of the United States for the State of Louisiana in relation to the final completion of the surveys and adjustments of land claims in said district; and that he also communicate copies of all instructions, or letters, to the register and receiver of said district, in relation to the suspension of sales of land in said district by private entry, with the reasons for such suspension, if any. Also, to communicate whether any appropriations have been made by Congress in the years 1836, 1837, 1838, or 1839, for the purpose of prosecuting or completing the surveys in Louisiana, and particularly in the aforesaid district, specifying the amount of each appropriation, and whether any portion of the same has been expended in making the surveys in said district; and, if so, how much. Also, whether the Department have included, in the estimates for the present year submitted to Congress, any appropriation for making surveys in said district; if so, if it is the intention of the Department to expend the appropriation, if it shall be made, in resurveying claims or lands heretofore surveyed.

On motion of Mr. CRABB,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the accommodation of the District Court of the United States, while in session at the city of Tuscaloosa.

On motion of Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route, with a daily line of post coaches, from Athens, Georgia, through the valley of the Tennessee river, and the northern counties of Mississippi, to the Mississippi river.

On motion of Mr. J. W. DAVIS,

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing the claim of J. Wilson, of Indiana, for a horse lost in the service of the United States in the year 1813.

On motion of Mr. C. JOHNSON,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions inquire into the propriety of paying the heirs of Harriet Barnes the amount due him as a Revolutionary pensioner, up to the time of his death.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS submitted the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That a select committee of —— members be appointed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of abolishing the Military Academy at West Point, and establishing a military school of application and practice for the improvement of the officers of the army of the United States in the application and practice, for military purposes, of the several branches of elementary and theoretic sciences involved in the art of war, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. J. W. DAVIS,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Terre Haute to Bloomfield, Indiana, upon the South Louisville road.

On motion of Mr. JAMESON,

Resolved, That the application of Elizabeth Young for the allowance of a claim of her deceased husband against the Government, for services rendered under the order of the Government in taking the number of the Cherokees in Arkansas, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; of A. Hudspath, for a special pre emption to a certain tract of land therein mentioned, to the Committee on on the Public Lands; of Tarlton Ellege and James White, for a grant of a certain quantity of land, to the Committee on the Public Lands; of James Evans, Jacob Groom, and James Alcorn, for an application for depredations committed by the peace party of the Sac and Fox Indians on their property in Missouri, during the late war, to the Committee on Indian Affairs; of H. S. Chalmer, in relation to claim on the Government, as heir of his father, for property burned in Washington city during the late war, to the Committee of Claims; of Samuel Glachiez, for a special pre-emption, to the Committee on the Public Lands; and of Henry Underhill, for a special pre-emption, to the Committee on the Public Lands, together with the papers referring to each.

On motion of Mr THOMAS SMITH,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the expediency of establishing a cross mail route from Lawrenceburg, Indiana, a point on the great mail route from the city of Cincinnati to Indianapolis, to Vernon, a point on the mail route from the city of Madison, Indiana, to Indianapolis, and at present the termination of the Madison and Indianapolis railroad, including the following intermediate places, viz.—Aurora, Wilmington, the county seat of Dearborne county; and Monshell, Versailles, the county seat of Ripley county; and New Marion: the mail to be conveyed on said route three times a week, in four-horse coaches, if, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, the resources of the Department and the business of the country will justify it; if not, then in a two-horse stage coach daily.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from New Trenton, in Franklin county, Indiana, via Sunman's, to Napoleon, in Ripley county; the mail to be carried in such manner as the Postmaster General shall direct.

On motion of Mr. PROFFIT,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be directed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a four-horse stage route from Evansville, via Boonville, Petersburg, Washington, to Indianapolis, in Indiana; also, from Evansville, via Prince, to Petersburg, Washington, to Bloomington, in Indiana; also, from Rockport, in Spencer county, via Gentryville, to Washington, in Davies county, Indiana; also, from Troy, in Perry county, via Jasper, in Dubois county, to Washington, in Davies county.

On motion of Mr. WHITE,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands inquire into the expediency of reviving the law authorizing the proprietors of front lands, in Louisiana, to enter the back lands of the same.

Mr. A. V. BROWN submitted the following, which lies over:

Joint resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States in relation to the election of President.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both houses concurring, That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the Constitution, to wit:

No person who shall hereafter be elected, and shall serve the period of four years, or any part thereof, as President of the United States, shall be again elegible to that office.

Mr. REYNOLDS submitted the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That the committee on the Public Lands be authorized to inquire into the expediency of granting to the State of Illinois for the use of the public improvements in said State, each alternate section of the public land on which the several railroads are located, or the whole of the public lands yet unsold, on condition the State pay over to the General Government one-third of the amount that would arise from the sale of the same.

Mr. CARTER offered the following, which lies over:

Whereas the title to a portion of the public domain or lands owned by the United States was derived from several of the States, by deeds of cession providing that such lands should be held as a common fund for the use and benefit of all the States of this Union, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and should be faithfully and bona fide disbursed for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever; and whenever the title to the residue of said domain was acquired by treaty or purchase of foreign States, to meet which and to extinguish Indian title large sums of money have been paid out of the public Treasury, which moneys were a part of the proceeds of the lands ceded by the said States for specific purposes, and in part were collected of the tax-paying citizens of the whole country: and whereas the national debt which we were compelled to contract on account of the Revolutionary war, (and for the extinguishment of which the States ceded their lands, reserving to themselves and the other States the residue,) and also on account of the late war, both of which were waged to assert our liberties, and to vindicate our honor and our right, has been fully paid and extinguished: and whereas it is believed that, by rigid economy in all branches of the public service, the customs and other sources of revenue, exclusive of the avails of the public lands, will be abundantly adequate to meet all the necessary wants of the General Government: and whereas experience proves that whatever may be the revenue of a nation, the expenditures will be made to cover, if, they do not exceed, that revenue, and the only way to enforce a just and necessary economy is to prevent an accumulation of money in the Treasury beyond a bare sufficiency to meet the real and necessary wants of that Government: and whereas the authorities of this Union held the said lands in trust for the sole use and benefit of the people of the States of this Confederacy, and it is the imperative duty of Congress to execute the said trust in good faith, and in accordance with said written agreements and contracts, and to cause the proceeds of said lands to be applied for the use aforesaid, by dividing the same among all the States of the Union upon equitable and fair principles: and whereas the performance of that duty at the present time will enable the States to foster their systems of common schools, to undertake, sustain, and prosecute works of internal improvement, lessen the taxes upon the people, and in a variety of ways will promote the prosperity and happiness of the people of this Union: Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of one member from each State shall be raised, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the expediency and propriety of distributing the proceeds of the sales of the public lands which shall hereafter accrue among the several States of this Union; and whether said States should be required, upon making such division, to apply the avails, or any part thereof, to any one or more objects; and whether, in the event that the revenue from the receipts of the customs and other sources shall be estimated to fall below —— millions of dollars, it may be proper to supply such deficiency, by special appropriation, out of the fund arising from the sale of the public lands, to meet the necessary expenditures of the Government: Provided, in the event of a war between the United States and any foreign power, said distribution shall cease and be suspended during the continuance of such war.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved the following, which lies over one day:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the amount agreed to be paid to the Caddo Indians by the treaty made with them on July 1, 1835, at what times and dates the said sums were paid, to whom paid, by whom paid, and whether the Indians have received said sums; if so, whether in money or merchandise; and if the latter, what was its real value. Also, that he communicate all the correspondence in the Department relating to the payment of said sums, together with all the information in his possession connected with the subject. And the said Secretary of War is also directed to communicate, in a separate report, all the documents on file in relation to the negotiation of said treaty with the Caddo Indians, and the reservation therein made, the instructions to the commissioners who negotiated the same, and all correspondence with him or other persons in relation to said treaty, or the reservations therein; the rights of the Indians to the land which was occupied by them; what right or claim the persons in whose favor the reservations are made, have or had to the same; and generally all documents or information in the possession of the Department relating to the rights or claims of the said Indians; the negotiation and execution of the treaty, the rights of individuals who have been affected by it; the objects of the Government in making said treaty, and any other matter he may think proper connected with these objects.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 25, 1840.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of a number of commission merchants and importers of foreign goods, citizens of the United States, praying a revision of the revenue laws in relation to the importation of woollen goods; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. B. also presented the petition of a number of citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, praying a revision of the laws relating to the sale and transfer of American vessels when abroad, and the adoption of measures in conjunction with other nations for the the suppression of the slave trade throughout the world; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. B. also presented twelve memorials from citizens of the United States, remonstrating against the employment of bloodhounds, in prosecuting the war against the Seminole Indians; which were laid on the table.

On motion by Mr. PIERCE, the petition of William Rand, now on file, was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by KING, various petitions of Joshua Kennedy were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WALL presented the petition of William P. Rathbone; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The CHAIR submitted documents in relation to the claims of Martin Burke, a soldier of the Revolutionary war, to a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. STRANGE, it was ordered that the petition of the heirs of Edward Buncombe, now on file, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion, it was ordered that Mr. KNIGHT be excused from serving on the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and that the CHAIR make the appointment to supply the vacancy.

Mr. DIXON was accordingly appointed.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York, which, were read.

Mr. T. then addressed the Senate at considerable length on the resolutions; and after a discussion, in which Messrs. WRIGHT, TAPPAN, and TALLMADGE, participated,

On motion by Mr. WRIGHT, the resolutions were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which had been referred the petition of William Barclay, and the petition of the heirs of Joseph Wallace, made adverse reports thereon; which were severally ordered to be printed.

Mr. L. also, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William D. Ferguson; which was agreed to.

Mr. L. also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of George De Passan of Louisiana; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Francis Laventure, Ebenezer Childs, and Linus Thompson, reported the same without amendment, with a special report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported

A bill for the relief of the heirs of Henry Eckford, deceased; and

A bill for the relief of Reynell Coates and Walter R. Johnson; which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of Francis Gehon, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill for the relief of Juan Belgar;

The bill for the relief of Daniel Marsaque;

The bill for the relief of Joseph Bogy;

The bill for the relief of Sebastian Butcher, and the heirs or legal representatives of Bartholomew Butcher, Michael Butcher, and Peter Bloom; and were severally taken up on their third reading, read a third time, and passed.

The bill to settle the title to certain tracts of land in the State of Arkansas;

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business,

And then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, February 25, 1840.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the 7th instant, a report from the Secretary of State, on the subject of the blockade of the ports of China by the British: referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, made in compliance with the resolution of the 10th instant, transmitting a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, showing the quantity of public lands sold in each year since 1830, which have been ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, and thirty years in the market; and the quantity of public lands that remain unsold that have been offered for sale for the same periods; and

On motion of Mr. DAVIS of Indiana, it was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER announced that the immediate question before the House, was the appeal from the decision of the CHAIR, taken by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] that under the 28th rule of the House, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FILLMORE,] who had been declared to be out of order, for alluding to the proceedings of, and reading resolutions adopted by, the Committee of Elections, in relation to the New Jersey contested election, could not proceed in his remarks, unless he be permitted to do so by the House, objection having been raised to his proceeding. The appeal from this decision was the question before the House, and upon which the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. TILLINGHAST,] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. GRAHAM asked the gentleman from Rhode Island to yield the floor to permit him to offer a resolution; which was read for information, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of three thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, to construct two inclined planes to the Potomac Bridge, so as to facilitate the running a ferry between the broken parts of said bridge; and, also, to hire the use of a boat, and the necessary hands to work the same, and transport all persons, produce, and stock, without charge, over that part of the Potomac river from which a portion of the bridge was recently removed and carried off by the ice and freshet.

Objection was made to its introduction; whereupon

Mr. GRAHAM moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. TURNEY called for the yeas and nays on that motion, which were ordered; and were—yeas 67, nays 91.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. RUSSELL said the character of the House was suffering in the opinion of the community, in consequence of the tardiness with which the business of the nation was transacted. At least one hundred claims have been matured by the committees, and an opportunity has not been afforded them to report. Too much time was taken up in debate; and it was highly proper that the House should now proceed to business. Mr. R. then moved a resolution, setting apart a portion of the day for the reception of the reports of committees.

Objection was, however, made to its reception.

The SPEAKER suggested to the House that the business of the nation could be got along with more facility if the rules and order of business were strictly adhered to. A great deal of time was consumed in motions to suspend the rules, all to no purpose.

Mr. RUSSELL said he was compelled, from the necessity of the case, to move a suspension of the rules; but the motion was not admissible.

Mr. TILLINGHAST having claimed his right to the floor on the appeal, he addressed the House at some length in opposition to the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said if his colleague [Mr. FILLMORE] had been permitted to proceed, he would have been delivered of his speech long before this, and with much less injury to the public business. He appealed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PETRIKIN] to withdraw his objection and permit his colleague to proceed, and thereby save the time of the House.

Mr. PETRIKIN declining to withdraw his objection,

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved the previous question on the appeal, which was seconded, and the main question ordered; which main question was, "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House."

The yeas and nays having been previously ordered on this question, they were taken, and were—yeas 96, nays 91.

So the decision of the CHAIR was affirmed, and the gentleman from New York was not permitted to proceed in his remarks.

Mr. STUART moved that the House proceed to the orders of the day.

Mr. VANDERPOEL demanded the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON inquired of the CHAIR what would be the business before the House, in case they refused to go to the orders of the day; and whether the subject of the morning hour would not go on.

The CHAIR replied in the affirmative; and said that the question would be the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAND,] that his colleague [Mr. FILLMORE] have leave to proceed.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana hoped the SPEAKER would not give his opinion to gentlemen in advance; for when the question should come up he would appeal from that decision.

Mr. STEWART then withdrew his motion to proceed to the orders of the day.

Mr. R. GARLAND renewed it.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, and resulted as follows—yeas 91, nays 110.

So the House refused to proceed to the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER said the question now before the House was the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAND,] that his colleague [Mr. FILLMORE] have leave to proceed in his remarks on the subject before the House.

Mr. R. GARLAND. Do I understand the SPEAKER to decide that the refusal of the House to proceed to the orders of the day, thereby continues the question before the House when the call for the orders of the day was made?

The SPEAKER. That is the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. R. GARLAND. Then I appeal from that decision on the following grounds, viz: that the House having, by a majority only, refused to proceed to dispose of the business on the SPEAKER'S table, and to the orders of the day, the rules setting apart one hour for the consideration of reports from committees and resolutions previous to proceeding to said business and orders, and giving said reports and resolutions precedence during that time, are not thereby suspended; that can only be done by a vote of two-thirds, that number being necessary to give the resolution, reported by the Committee of Elections, priority over all other business, as it produces a change in the order of business as established by the rules.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved the previous question on the appeal; which was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The main question was, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. R. GARLAND demanded the yeas and nays on that question; which were ordered, and were—yeas 152, nays 13.

So the decision of the CHAIR was sustained.

Mr. HAND then modified his motion, so as to leave it simply that his colleague be permitted to proceed—his former motion having been, "to proceed in order."

The question on granting leave was taken and agreed to.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved the following as a modification of his substitute for the original proposition of the committee:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be authorized to report to this House such papers, and such of their proceedings as they may desire to have printed by order of the House; and that they be instructed also to report forthwith which five of the ten individuals claiming seats from the State of New Jersey, received the greatest number of votes from the whole State for Representatives in the Congress of the United States at the election of 1838 in said State, with all the evidence of that fact in their possession: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent or delay the action of said committee in taking testimony, and deciding the said case upon the merits of the election.

Mr. FILLMORE then said he returned his thanks to the House; but he would not avail himself of the permission to speak, inasmuch as he could never submit that important right to the will of a majority. He would seek some other opportunity to give his views, when he could exercise the right to do so in virtue of the Constitution, and not by the permission of a majority. He would, however, so far avail himself of the opportunity afforded him to speak, as to amend the resolution of Mr. JOHNSON of Tennessee, by inserting the word "legal" before the word "votes," and to strike out the word "forthwith."

Mr. FISHER spoke at some length on the merits of the question before the House, and, in the course of his remarks, alluded to the course the committee had pursued, in delaying the report. It had frequently undone at night all which it had done during the day. He adverted, also, to the course of the Opposition, in staving off the question as to who were entitled to seats, and the great unwillingness they evinced to give light upon the subject which was now covered up in the committee. Mr. F. adverted to the fact that the gentlemen claiming seats in virtue of the Governor's certificates had never pretended that they had a majority of the votes of the people of New Jersey, but placed it on the ground that they held the certificate. He argued at some length to show that the vote of the people was better evidence to entitle to a seat on that floor than the certificate of the Governor of a State, which might be fraudulently obtained. He viewed the subject in all its constitutional bearings, in reply to the arguments heretofore advanced to sustain the rights of the certificate members. The certificate of the Governor had been given in this case on a one-sided view of the poll, as was fully established by the testimony which had been referred by the House to the Committee of Elections. Mr. F. also wished to disabuse the public mind of another thing whilst he was up. The certificate members, after the decision of the House against the certificates, raised the question that they were also entitled to seats, because those which the Governor refused to accredit had received two hundred and forty-three illegal votes, a list of which they handed in to the House, and had referred to the committee, accompanied by a mass of testimony in the form of depositions taken by them to establish the fact.

Now, said Mr. F. there was not a shadow of proof in the testimony to sustain the charge above; but, on the contrary, it was proved that there were only twelve illegal votes, and that these had been given to the gentlemen who claimed seats on the certificates. Another allegation had been made by the same gentlemen, that the judges of election at Saddle river had robbed the ballot boxes of eight votes. This, too, has been proved to be without a shadow of foundation. This would be an offence involving a high penalty in that State; and the party accused have challenged their accusers to present them to the grand jury, to be tried for this penal offence. But, said Mr. F. I believe the accusers never will present the judges of election, as was threatened, because the charge was equally unfounded as the other as to the illegal votes.

He presented many other strong points, which went to show that the House should act on this subject without delay; a full report of which will be published hereafter.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut regretted that the gentleman who had preceded him had been interrupted; and that a wider scope had not been allowed, to enable the members of the committee to state all the facts. He commented at large on the manner in which the subject had been brought before the House. It had been usual to ask of the chairmen of committees whether they were ready to report, or at what time it was thought the committees could report: but, in this case, without any consultation with the chairman of the Committee of Elections, the gentleman from Tennessee had thought proper to introduce a proposition of an extraordinary character, to compel the committee to report without regard to the condition of the business before it.

Mr. SMITH yielded to the suggestions of several members, and moved an adjournment.

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and were—yeas 91, nays 94, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, William O. Butler, Carter, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dillett, Evans, Fillmore, Fisher, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Henry, Hoffman, Holmes, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, King, Lawrence, Leet, Lincoln, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Naylor, Ogle, Osborne, Peck, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, James Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Sweeny, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—91.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, A. G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, W. B. Campbell, Carroll, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Conner, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Cross, Dana, Davee, John Davis, Doan, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Floyd, Galbraith, Gerry, Goggin, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hill of N. C. Holleman, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jameson, Cave Johnson, Nath'l Jones, John W Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McCarty, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Newhard, Parish, Parmenter, Paynter, Petrikin, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rives, Robinson, Edward Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Swearingen, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—94.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SMITH resumed his remarks; and after characterizing the proceeding in relation to this subject as of a most novel character, he thought it would have been more courteous to the committee to have consulted it whether it was prepared to make a report, before abruptly thrusting forward a resolution directing it to report forthwith. He denounced it as unprecedented in legislation, and involved an attack on the committee. The resolution in effect said that the committee was incompetent to form an opinion on the testimony before it, and therefore, it must be reported to the House, to enable it to do so. It was an implied censure—it was as much as to say that the House had no confidence in the committee. He disapproved the decision of the House that the members of the committee should not refer to the condition of the business before it to show not only that it was impossible to make a report, but that it would do great injustice to the parties litigating, to do so at this time. Mr. S. before concluding, yielded the floor to

Mr. HOFFMAN, who moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and were—yeas 91, nays 80.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, February 26, 1840.

Mr. GRUNDY presented the credentials of the Honorable ALEXANDER ANDERSON, elected by the Legislature of Tennessee a Senator from that State in the place of the Hon H. L. WHITE; which were read.

The usual oaths were administered to Mr. ANDERSON, and he took his seat in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate in relation to the line of military posts from the Missouri river, into the pass or passes of the Rocky Mountains most usually traversed to descend into the valley of the Oregon or Columbia river; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Oregon Territory, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented a joint preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of Alabama, in favor of a cession to that State, on reasonable terms, of all the public lands remaining unsold within her limits, and a graduation and reduction of prices. Also, a memorial of the same Legislature, recommending various amendments of the late pre-emption law, so as to extend its benefits to those not embraced by its provisions at the time of its passage; and also to extend like privileges to those who have since made settlements; both of which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the memorial of a number of tobacco manufacturers in the city of New York, praying that an increase of duty may be imposed upon imported cigars; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. MOUTON presented the petition of Marcelin Tassin, praying the right of pre-emption to a tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. M. also presented the memorial of Anson C. Surlls, of the State of Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. MOUTON, the petition of Jean B. Courean, now on file, was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. NORVELL presented the memorial of the commissioners of Kent county, Michigan, praying the right of pre-emption to a quarter section of land in said county, to be applied to the erection of a court-house; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. KING presented a preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Alabama, on the subject of the claim of that State against the United States, for advances for the pay and subsistence of certain companies of militia and volunteers called into service of the United States during the Creek and Seminole hostilities in 1836 and 1837; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. K. also presented a preamble and resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of Alabama, instructing the Senators, and requesting the Representatives of said State to use their exertions to procure the establishment of certain mail routes within that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. YOUNG, the Committee on Roads and Canals were discharged from the further consideration of the report of the Secretary of War, of the 27th January, in relation to the cost of the extension and completion of the Cumberland road to Jefferson city; of resolutions of the Legislature of Missouri in favor of the continuation of the national road; and of the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa, in favor of an appropriation for the completion of the road from Du Buque to the northern boundary of the State of Missouri; and that these papers be filed with the bills to which they relate.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred certain memorials of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa, severally asking for

The improvement of certain Territorial roads;

The construction of certain roads in said Territory; and made adverse reports thereon.

The construction of a road from Burlington to Fairfield;

Mr. MOUTON, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Don Carlos Dehault Delassus, late Spanish Lieutenant Governor of Baton Rouge; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. YOUNG, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill granting to the Mississippi and Rock river Canal Company a portion of the public lands for the purposes therein mentioned; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

The following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. BUCHANAN, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the expediency of proposing to the States such an amendment to the Federal Constitution as will secure a large specie basis for the circulation of the country, by prohibiting the issue and circulation of bank notes, and other paper currency, of denominations so low as to prevent the circulation of gold and silver in the ordinary transactions of business, and in payment of the wages of labor.

Mr. WEBSTER was of opinion that Congress, under the Constitution, already possessed full and plenary powers over the currency, and it only needed a disposition to exercise them. Even if we voted in favor of a proposition based upon this resolution, there was no probability that a sufficient number of States would accede to it; and by asking them for this power, we admit that we do not possess it at present, which would place us in a worse position than formerly. He, for one, was not disposed to assist in placing Congress in such a situation. Its only effect would be to countenance the idea that the currency must remain in its present deplorable condition until we can improve it by this roundabout process of an application to the States for an amendment of the Constitution. If this was really so, our situation was more deplorable than he had yet imagined it to be.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that, on this preliminary question, he should detain the Senate with but a very brief exposition of his views in presenting the resolution. Indeed he had not anticipated any debate upon the subject, supposing that Senators would have waited until the report of the committee should be made.

In the first place, (said Mr. B.) no gentleman will deny the truth of the proposition, that it is desirable to infuse into the general circulation of the country a much larger proportion of gold and silver than exists at present. Every thing which we see and hear, and feel, around us, must convince us all that this is an object of the first importance. On this point, therefore, I shall offer no argument upon the present occasion.

What, then, is the only possible mode of accomplishing this purpose? It is a law of currency almost as universal in its operation as any law of nature, that paper and specie of the same denominations cannot circulate together. We all recollect the celebrated message sent by Mr. Burke to Mr. Pitt, in the year 1797 or 1798, that if he consented to the issue of one pound notes, he would never see a guinea again. The subsequent experience of England had proved the sagacity of the statesman; and guineas and sovereigns were almost as completely banished from general circulation in that kingdom, as if they did not exist. After a persevering struggle of many years, led by their most distinguished statesmen of both the great political parties, the five pound note policy, originally advocated by the celebrated Adam Smith, finally prevailed. One pound notes were excluded from circulation, and in the course of a very few years, it was estimated that one-half of the currency of that country consisted of the precious metals. Their lowest bank note is now of the denomination of about twenty-four dollars. They have now about half and half of paper and specie.

What is the condition of our own country in this respect? Can our half eagles circulate together with five dollar notes? That they do not must be admitted by all. Will eagles ever circulate generally in a country where there are ten dollar notes issued in abundance to take their place? In those States where one dollar notes are in general circulation, it is almost as rare a thing to see a silver dollar as it is in other States, where five dollar notes circulate, to find a half eagle.

If there ever was a question upon which there had appeared to be an unanimous, or an almost unanimous, opinion among our public men of all parties, it was in regard to the necessity of excluding from circulation all bank notes and other paper currency of a less denomination then twenty dollars. This, all admit, ought to be effected gradually, and in such a manner as to give no shock to the business of the country; but all agree in the ultimate object. It was a favorite principle with General Jackson, and had found equal favor with the President of the United States. My friend from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] had presented this question to the Senate some years ago, and on his motion we had adopted an amendment, with unexampled unanimity, prohibiting the officers of the Government from receiving or disbursing bank notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars. The same principle had been adopted in the celebrated currency bill, and, under its provisions, after a certain period, the notes of no bank which issued notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars were to be received in the payment of the dues to the Government. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] had made the ablest speech he had ever heard him deliver on this floor, in favor of the principle of excluding from circulation notes under twenty dollars.

Now, sir, can human ingenuity devise any mode of accomplishing this object so much desired by all, but by an amendment of the Constitution? If it can, I should adopt that course. I hold the Constitution in such reverence that I would not offer to amend it without absolute necessity. I would apply the rule of Epic poetry to its provisions—I forget the Latin quotation—and say that the power of a Divinity ought never to be invoked without absolute necessity. To use the phrase of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] I can see no mode under God's heavens of accomplishing the object but by amending the Constitution. If one State undertakes to make this reform, what is the consequence? Other States will not adopt it; and their five and ten dollar notes fill up the vacuum. Hence, in self-defence, those States which desire a reform, are obliged to submit to the evils of the small note currency. There is no mode of reaching it but by proposing to all the States an amendment to the Constitution, which will be alike binding on all.

If I concurred in opinion with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] that Congress already possess the power of regulating the currency of the States, I certainly should not propose such an amendment. His sentiments are peculiar upon the subject, and I should be glad that he would point out the particular manner in which this can be accomplished. It is certainly not by the agency of a Bank of the United States; because, if such an institution should ever be re-established, and I trust it never may, you could only provide by its charter that it should not issue notes under twenty dollars. No man will contend that this would prevent the issue and circulation, under the authority of the States, of notes of similar denominations.

Who doubts the utility of such a regulation to the banks themselves? At present, where there is a demand for gold and silver for exportation, and their vaults become exhausted, they have no mode of replenishing them. The specie necessary for this purpose is not in circulation in the country. Adopt this amendment, and the difficulty will at once vanish. As the specie is withdrawn from them, the void will be supplied by those drawing upon the circulation of the country for the necessary amount. Let there be a general circulation of half specie and half paper, and the danger of suspensions of specie payments will be comparatively at an end.

But I promised that I should not detain the Senate long, and I shall not be drawn into a general discussion of the merits of the proposition at this stage, unless compelled to do so by the course of other gentlemen.

After some further remarks from Messrs. STRANGE, WEBSTER, and BUCHANAN, (which will be given hereafter,) and without coming to a decision on the question, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of

THE SPECIAL ORDER.

The resolution from the Select Committee on the assumption of the debts of the States was then taken up, and Mr. CRITTENDEN addressed the Senate at length on the subject.

Mr. STRANGE, after making some remarks in reply, gave way to a motion for adjournment, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, February 26, 1840.

The CHAIR announced that the subject before the House was the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections, to grant to that committee the right to have printed such papers as it might deem necessary to facilitate the business before it, and the substitute of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON therefor, in the following words:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be authorized to report to this House such papers, and such of their proceedings as they may desire to have printed by order of the House; and that they be instructed also to report forthwith which five of the ten individuals claiming seats from the State of New Jersey, received the greatest number of votes from the whole State for Representatives in the Congress of the United States at the election of 1838 in said State, with all the evidence of that fact in their possession: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent or delay the action of said committee in taking testimony, and deciding the said case upon the merits of the election.

Mr. FILLMORE proposed to amend the substitute, by inserting the word "legal" before the word "votes," and to strike out the word "forthwith."

Mr. CHARLES JOHNSON asked the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. SMITH,] who was entitled to the floor, to give way, to permit him to offer a resolution; which was read, for the information of the House, as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that the CLERK of this House, without the authority of law, or sanction of the House of Representatives, did, on the 25th day of March, and 23d day of December last, make two several contracts in writing with one S. D. Langtree, and by which contracts said Langtree agreed to furnish all the stationery, and execute all the lithographing and copperplate engraving which should be required for the Twenty-sixth Congress, as may more fully appear by referring to said contracts respectively: and whereas it is alleged that, in pursuance of said contract or contracts, said Langtree (who is neither a stationer, lithographer, or engraver) has furnished and delivered to said CLERK, for the use of this House, a large quantity of stationery, and has presented his bill for the same, amounting to $19,521 64, and that said stationery, particularly the paper, is of an inferior quality, and is charged at prices equal to twenty per cent. above the usual prices of stationery of the best quality, and by which difference of price and quality this Government (if said bill is allowed) would sustain a loss of more than $4,000 for the stationery already delivered; and that if said contracts should be sanctioned by this House, and continued in force during the Twenty-sixth Congress, the Government would be subjected to a sacrifice of more than $15,000, arising from the employment of another person to perform the duties which the CLERK himself is required to perform, by the resolution of this House, passed March 3, 1827, and under which it has been the uniform practice of the Clerks of this House to furnish the stationery, until the making of the contracts above referred to: therefore,

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House has no power or authority to make any prospective contract which will require an appropriation of moneys out or the contingent fund of this House, or an appropriation by Congress to satisfy the same, without the express authority of this House, and that the contracts referred to in the foregoing preamble are wholly inoperative and void.

Resolved, nevertheless, That if the said Langtree shall (in writing) elect to give up and cancel the said two contracts, then, and in that event, the Committee on Accounts are hereby authorized to audit and allow to him his bill for stationery already delivered, and services performed under said contracts, subject to such deductions as ought to be made therefrom, on account of the quality and the prices charged therefor; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. SMITH said he could not yield the floor, unless it was the understanding of the House, that he would not forfeit it by so doing. If it was the universal wish of the members of the House, that the resolution should be considered, he had no objection to accommodate the gentleman from New York [Mr JOHNSON.]

Mr. JAMES GARLAND hoped the House would consent to the consideration of the resolution, and that the investigation should be had. He asked it as a friend of one of the contracting parties, [the CLERK,] as an act of justice to him, to the House, and the country, that the resolution should be passed.

Objection was made to its reception; when

Mr. SMITH said he did not believe he could yield the floor, without forfeiting his right to it.

Mr. S. then occupied the floor for upwards of three hours in continuation of his remarks on yesterday, and in opposition to the proposition before the House, and in commenting on and censuring the course which had been pursued by the House in reference to the New Jersey contest.

Mr. FILLMORE modified his amendment to the resolution by substituting the word "lawful" for the word "legal."

Mr. RIVES followed in reply to Mr. SMITH. He showed the great importance of the House acting speedily on the question of who were entitled to seats from New Jersey; and to enable it to do so, he contended that all the facts in possession of the committee should be reported forthwith. He inferred, from the course of the Opposition, that it was their object to shut out the light of truth from the people, for the purpose of misrepresenting the facts, and manufacturing political capital out of the same.

After some remarks from Mr. WELLER, which will be hereafter given,

Mr. CRABB obtained the floor, and spoke in opposition to the proposition of Mr. JOHNSON. He considered it unprecedented, and very unjust to the Committee of Elections—it was an implied censure on the committee. Mr. C. after speaking a short time, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. TAYLOR demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and were—yeas 79, nays 88.

So the House having refused to adjourn,

Mr. CRABB resumed his remarks for a short time, and gave way to

Mr. FILLIMORE, who moved that the House adjourn; upon which

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 79, nays 75.

The House then adjourned

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, February 27, 1840.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented nineteen memorials from citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the imposition of a moderate duty on imported silks; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TAPPAN presented the petition of two hundred and thirty-eight citizens of Ohio, praying Congress to aid them in making a settlement in the Territory of Oregon, on Lewis river, and setting forth the advantages that would result from such settlement; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Oregon Territory.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a memorial from William Blake, praying to be allowed to import from Canada, free of duty, a quantity of shot, or sprue iron; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SPENCE presented the petition of Thomas Fraley; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WALL presented the petition of William Conner; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill for the relief of Charles L. Fleischmann; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made an adverse report on the petition of the heirs of Madam De Lusser; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make an arrangement, or compromise with any of the sureties on bonds given to the United States by Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the customs for the port of New York; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HENDERSON, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to confirm the survey and location of claims for lands in the State of Mississippi, east of the Pearl river, and south of the 31st degree of north latitude; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Jacob Bauer, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. P. also from the same committee, made an unfavorable report in the case of William Lefebvre.

The resolution submitted by Mr. BUCHANAN, which was under consideration yesterday, was then taken up, after some remarks from Messrs. CALHOUN, PRESTON, GRUNDY, DAVIS, HENDERSON, Clay of Alabama, ALLEN, STRANGE, and BUCHANAN, which will be given hereafter. was adopted, and the CHAIR appointed the following Senators as said committee:

Mr. BUCHANAN,
Mr. GRUNDY,
Mr. CRITTENDEN,
Mr. WRIGHT,
Mr. DAVIS,
Mr. CLAY of Alabama, and
Mr. HENDERSON.

THE SPECIAL ORDER.

The resolution from the Select Committee on the assumption of the debts of the States, was then taken up, and Mr. STRANGE addressed the Senate, at length, in reply to Messrs. CLAY of Kentucky and CRITTENDEN, and in favor of the report.

Mr. HENDERSON followed, at length, in opposition to the report.

On motion of Mr. TALLMADGE, the subject was informally passed over,

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, February 27, 1840.

The CHAIR announced that the subject before the House was the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections, to grant to that committee the right to have printed such papers as it might deem necessary to facilitate the business before it, and the substitute of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON therefor, in the following words:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be authorized to report to this House such papers, and such of their proceedings as they may desire to have printed by order of the House; and that they be instructed also to report forthwith which five of the ten individuals claiming seats from the State of New Jersey, received the greatest number of votes from the whole State for Representatives in the Congress of the United States at the election of 1838 in said State, with all the evidence of that fact in their possession: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent or delay the action of said committee in taking testimony, and deciding the said case upon the merits of the election. And the proposition of

Mr. FILLMORE to amend the substitute, by inserting the the word "lawful" before the word "votes," and to strike out the word "forthwith."

Mr. ADAMS asked Mr. CRABB (who was entitled to the floor on the above proposition) to give way to allow him to present a report from the Select Committee on the Smithsonian Bequest. It was a subject which had excited a good deal of public interest; and he merely wished to make the report, and have it printed, which would occupy but a few moments of the time of the House.

Mr. CRABB said if it was the universal consent of the House to receive the report at that time, he had no objection to give way for the purpose. But objection was made.

Mr. J. W. JONES also endeavored to prevail on the gentleman from Alabama to permit him to introduce a resolution, proposing to make the Treasury note bill the special order for a particular day. The subject was one of so much importance as to have called from the President of the United States a special message, accompanied by a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the absolute necessity of immediate action on the subject.

Mr. J. was here interrupted in his remarks by several members, who objected to the introduction of the resolution; and

Mr. CRABB reiterated that he had no objection to give way for the introduction of any proposition which would meet the general approbation of the House; but objection was still persisted in.

Mr. C. then, in continuation of his remarks of yesterday, contended that the proposition before the House was not only unprecedented in the legislation of Congress, but was discourteous to the committee of which he was a member, and a reflection upon it, highly censurable. At the expiration of the morning hour Mr. C. was interrupted in his remarks by Mr. BRIGGS, who called for the orders of the day.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, who was in favor of the House finishing the business before it, demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. MORGAN moved a call of the House.

Mr. HOFFMAN demanded the yeas and nays on the motion whether there should be a call; which were ordered, and were—yeas 89, nays 97.

So the House refused to have a call.

Mr. CRABB resumed his remarks, and occupied the remainder of the day in an examination of various precedents of contested elections, to show that the course of the Committee of Elections, in granting time to the contestants to take testimony, was perfectly justified by those precedents. He also made a justification of the course which the Governor and Privy Council of New Jersey had pursued in granting certificates upon the incomplete result of the polls presented to them. He had no doubt they were governed by pure and patriotic motives, without regard to the future, or to what the ultimate effect that decision would have upon the organization of the House.

Mr. C. concluded at four o'clock, when he offered the following amendment to the resolution, in the words of the Constitution, to be inserted after the word "votes," "given by electors having the qualification requisite for the elector of the most numerous branch of the Legislature of said State"

Mr. FILLMORE accepted the above as a modification of his amendment; when

Mr. MEDILL obtained the floor, and was about proceeding in his remarks, but, by the solicitation of several members, gave way to

Mr. STARKWEATHER, who moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays on that motion, which were ordered, and were—yeas 105, nays 84; accordingly,

The House then adjourned,

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, February 28, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, in relation to the payment of Government drafts by the deposite banks since the general resumption of specie payments in 1838; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEBSTER presented several Abolition petitions: the motions to receive which were laid on the table.

Mr. W. also presented a remonstrance against the use of bloodhounds in the Florida war; which was laid on the table.

Also, a petition for a Congress of Nations to adjust international difficulties; which was referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations.

Also, seven petitions from citizens of Philadelphia county, praying the restoration and continuation of the protective system; which were referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Also, a petition from Henry Wilson for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the petition of a number of umbrella makers, praying the imposition of a duty on imported silk umbrellas and parasols; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented eight memorials from citizens of Philadelphia county, praying the restoration and continuation of the protective system. Mr. B took that occasion to say, that when this important subject was taken up for consideration, it could not originate in the Senate, as, by an express constitutional provision, all revenue bills must originate in the House of Representatives. The memorials were referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. ALLEN presented three memorials from citizens of Washington city, praying the renewal and modification of the charter of said city; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial of a number of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. B. also presented two memorials remonstrating against the use of bloodhounds in the Florida war; which were laid on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred certain resolutions of the General Assembly of Connecticut in favor of the establishment of a national foundry within that State, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. MOUTON presented a memorial of citizens of New Orleans, praying a repeal of the naturalization laws; which was laid on the table.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the memorial of Simon Giron, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the organization of a company of sappers, miners, and pontoneers; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WHITE submitted the following resolution; which was considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be required to furnish copies of the reports, estimates, and plans of the following surveys ordered by Congress, and made under the direction of the Bureau of Topographical Engineers: namely, of the survey for improving the navigation of the Neenah and Wisconsin rivers, the survey of the Rock river, the survey of the Haven of Rock river, and the survey of the pier at the northern extremity of Winnebago lake.

The resolution reported some time since from the Committee on Commerce, on the subject of allowing drawback on foreign coal consumed in steam vessels, was taken up, and, after some remarks from Messrs. WRIGHT, TAPPAN, BETTS, HENDERSON, WILLIAMS, NORVELL, DAVIS, and BUCHANAN, was, on motion of the latter, postponed until Monday next.

THE SPECIAL ORDER.

The resolution from the Select Committee on the assumption of the debts of the States was then taken up, and Mr. TALLMADGE addressed the Senate at length on the subject.

The Senate then adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 28, 1840.

The CHAIR announced that the subject before the House was the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections, to grant to that committee the right to have printed such papers as it might deem necessary to facilitate the business before it, and the substitute of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON therefor, as inserted below, and the proposition of

Mr. FILLMORE to amend the substitute, by inserting the word "lawful" before the word "votes," and insert the following after the word votes, viz: "given by electors having the qualification requisite for the electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature of said State."

Mr. JONES of Virginia asked the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MEDILL,] who was entitled to the floor on the above proposition, to yield the floor to enable him to offer a resolution, which was read for the information of the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the House will, on to-morrow, at one o'clock, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to consider House bill No. 18, making provision for the issuing of Treasury notes; that it be made the special order at that hour, and at the same hour on each succeeding day, till the bill shall be disposed of—to take precedence of all other business.

Mr. MEDILL said, from the importance of the subject, and the necessity of immediate action upon it, he could not refuse to yield the floor, if, by any possibility he could have it again. Mr. M. gave way, when Objection was made to the reception of the resolution by Messrs. GRANGER, STANLY, and others.

Mr. JONES moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of introducing the resolution, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were subsequently ordered.

Mr. STANLY moved a call of the House, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 62, nays 95.

So the House refused to order a call.

Mr. CASEY suggested to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] to modify the resolution so as to except Monday next, that being petition day.

Mr. JONES accepted the modification.

The question on suspending the rules was then taken and decided in the negative, (not being two-thirds)—yeas 102, nays 86.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Judson Allen, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, S H. Butler, W. O. Butler, Carroll, Casey, Clifford, Conner, Craig, Crockett, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Davis, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, James Garland, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Lawrence, Leadbetter, Leet, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Newhard, Nisbet, Parish, Parmenter, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Pope, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rives, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweeny, Taylor, Philip F. Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—102.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Bell, Bond, Brockway, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Cross, Cushing, Davies, Garrit Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dillett, Edwards, Evans, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, W. S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, King, Lincoln, McCarty, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Montgomery, Morgan, C. Morris, Ogle, Osborne, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, C. H. Williams, and Sherrod Williams—86.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. MEDILL then proceeded to address the House. He did not see in the resolution any thing censurable; and, although it had not been moved by a member of the Committee of Elections, or at the instance of a member of that Committe, he was not aware that any member of it was, or should have been, taken by surprise, as had been intimated by some of the gentlemen who had preceded him. He thought there was sufficient reason for the introduction of the resolution, and for the great anxiety of the House to know what the committee had been about. Considering the circumstances under which the subject was committed, there should have been a report on the returns first. Those who had expressed so much surprise at the introduction of the resolution ought not to have been astonished if the proposition had come from a member of that committee; even because he believed some intimations had been given by members that such a course would have to be resorted to, under the peculiar circumstances of the case.

He referred to the great anxiety expressed by the Opposition for an early settlement of the question previous to its reference to the committee. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] particularly contended that nothing should be done until the State of New Jersey was fully represented on that floor. He was now rather astonished that they were doing every thing in their power to prevent that State from having a full representation. If he could refer to the proceedings of the committee he would show conclusively that the gentlemen themselves were not surprised, because they must have anticipated that some movement would be made, in consequence of the course of the committee. He ventured to assert that there could not be found, in the history of contested elections, or in the legislation of Congress, a precedent for the case now before the House. There was none which had excited so much interest—no case where the Governor assumed powers derogatory to his oath, the Constitution, and the laws; and had attempted to thurst upon Congress as Representatives, gentlemen who had been rejected by the people. He then went into an examination of the precedents, which had been cited by the gentlemen in the Opposition to justify the delay of the committee, and proved conclusively that those precedents bore no analogy to the New Jersey contest. He thought if the precedents did justify a postponement, it was not a good reason that this committee should have taken on itself to delay a report to so remote a period. The resolution did not treat the committee with discourtesy. It was created by the House to investigate, and was always subject to such instructions as the House thought proper to send to it. They are compelled to regard the dictates of their creators, and have no right to consider it discourteous. As a member of a committee, he would as soon refuse to listen to the instruction of his constituents as to disregard those of the House. He deemed it essentially necessary, in view of the circumstances, that the House should express an opinion to the committee—and there was nothing improper or insulting in it. There were those on the committee who would have taken the responsibility of introducing the resolution, if the gentleman from Tennessee had not done so, because it was regarded as essentially necessary that the House should pass upon and give proper direction to that committee—the public voice demanded it.

Mr. M. then examined the question in all its constitutional bearings, and contended that there was abundant proof to destroy the force of the certificate as primary evidence of title to seats. The very data upon which the certificate was granted showed that it was erroneous. He contended that the Governor, in certifying who was elected, should have exhibited in the certificate the grounds upon which he came to that conclusion; he should have given, in accordance with the laws of New Jersey, the number of votes, showing who had the majority. Mr. M. exhibited to the House the proceedings of the Privy Council, and proved thereby, conclusively, that the question of illegal votes was never raised before that body, as the ground for the rejection of the polls of Millville and South Amboy; but that these districts were rejected solely on the ground that the Governor had no right to go behind the returns made to him.

Mr. M. also proved by various precedents that it had been the immemorial usage of the Governor and Council to go behind the returns, and to count votes which, by some informality, had been withheld by the returning officers. The question of illegal votes was not hinted at in that Council, but had been subsequently raised, and was a mere pretext in justification of the act of the Governor, and to cover a retreat from the position assumed. Mr. M. asked the gentlemen of the Opposition, if they believed the testimony before the committee was not sufficient to prove the charges against the Governor, why it was they they were afraid to let it be exhibited to the House and the country? If it was not proof against the Governor, they ought to demand its publication as an act of justice to the Governor. Mr. M. was here interrupted by

The SPEAKER, who said the morning hour had expired, and announced the order of the day.

The Senate bills on the SPEAKER's table were then twice read, and referred to appropriate committees.

The SPEAKER said the hour allotted for reports from committees and resolutions having expired, and all private bills before the House being disposed of, he submitted to the House whether it is not now competent for a majority to determine what business the House will proceed to consider. He wished a decision of the House to settle its future practice under similar circumstances, if it should again occur.

After a debate as to whether it was not the duty of the House to return to the consideration of the business of the morning hour, which was suspended by the announcement of the orders of the day, or whether it should not proceed to the consideration of the public bills, in which Messrs. CAVE JOHNSON, EVANS, HOLLEMAN, PETRIKIN, LINCOLN, and RUSSELL, participated,

Mr. DROMGOOLE obtained the floor, and said, inasmuch as all the private business had been disposed of, and the rule setting apart this day for that kind of business had been fulfilled and exhausted, and as he understood the SPEAKER had submitted a proposition upon which the House could vote yea or nay, and for the purpose of facilitating the business of the country, he moved the previous question.

Mr. R. GARLAND here rose to a point of order, whether it was not the duty of the SPEAKER to put his own construction on the rules, and decide, and leave it for the members to take an appeal; but he was ruled out of order.

The SPEAKER said if the previous question was sustained, the main question would be "Whether it was competent for a majority of the House to determine what business the House will proceed to consider."

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. RUSSELL demanded the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered, and were—yeas 107, nays 66.

So the House decided that it was competent for a majority to determine, under the circumstances, what business they would consider.

Mr. CRAIG then submitted a motion that the House proceed to consider the resolution from the Committee of Elections, before the House, during the morning hour.

Mr. BRIGGS moved so to amend the proposition of Mr. CRAIG, as to substitute the bill to provide for the continuation of the office of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved the previous question on Mr. BRIGG's proposition; which was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLLEMAN here rose to a point of order, whether it was competent to amend the proposition with one of a different nature entirely; but, at the suggestion of several members, did not press it.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. BRIGGS, he demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 82, nays 102.

So it was rejected.

The question then recurring on the motion of Mr. CRAIG, it was put, and the proposition was agreed to.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolution and pending amendments in relation to the New Jersey election.

Mr. MEDILL then resumed his remarks, and showed conclusively, by all the precedents growing out of the action of the Privy Council of New Jersey, that the Governor should have counted the votes of Millville and South Amboy. [This able speech of Mr. M. will be published in a few days at length.]

Mr. BROWN of Tennessee had been extremely anxious to participate in this debate; but, when he listened to the various and impatient calls for the question around him, and when he remembered the length of time that had been consumed in this discussion, not upon the merits of the New Jersey case, but upon a simple proposition to print that had been submitted by the chairman of the committee, and afterwards enlarged upon by the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee—when he remembered, he said, how much time had been consumed in this preliminary discussion—and when he remembered, also, that four of the members of the committee had argued this case fully, two on each side, he could not but admit that the anxiety expressed by gentlemen for taking this question was natural and proper.

It was true that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FILLMORE,] had not concluded his argument on this question; but he remembered that that gentleman was once in the arena, and that he touched by some private feeling, had withdrawn from it. He would therefore say to the gentleman, that he had better rest his claims for the attention of the House, until the main question should come up, and he would then be happy to meet him in the list. But for the present, said Mr. B. to meet the earnest calls for the question that I hear around me; to meet necessities of this House; nay, more, that we may progress with the public business; I move the previous question—action and not debate was what the public interests now loudly called for.

Mr. CRABB moved a call of the House.

Mr. RICE GARLAND asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 72, nays 93.

So the call was refused.

Mr. MONROE moved an adjournment, but withdrew the motion; when

Mr. BELL moved to lay the resolution and amendments on the table, and asked the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 87, nays 101, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Biddle, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Crockett, Cushing, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dillett, Edwards, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, Wm. S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Va. Hoffman, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Kempshall, King, Lawrence, Lincoln, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Ogle, Osborne, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Sherrod Williams—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, Wm. O. Butler, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Conner, Crary, Cross, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W Davis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, J. Garland, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, John Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Hook, Howard, Hubbard, Jameson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Lest, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montgomery, Newhard, Parish, Parmenter, Paynter, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rives, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, Thos. Smith, John Smith, Stankweather, Steenrod, Sumpter, Swearingen, Sweeny, Taylor, F. Thomas, P. F. Thomas, J. Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—101.

So the motion to lay on the table was rejected.

And the question recurring on the demand for the previous question, there was a second.

And the main question was ordered to be now taken.

Mr. TURNEY called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

And the question being first on the amendment of Mr. FILLMORE to the amendment of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, which was in the following words:

"Strike out the word 'forthwith,' and insert after the words 'greatest number of,' and before the word 'votes,' the word lawful;' so as to read 'and that they be instructed also to report which five of the ten individuals claiming seats from the State of New Jersey received the greatest number of lawful votes.'"

Mr. FILLMORE inquired of the CHAIR whether his amendment was divisible; if so, he moved that the question be first taken on inserting in the resolution the word "lawful" before the word "votes."

Mr. BANKS said it was not in order to move two amendments to the amendment; and therefore the question was indivisible, or the last amendment to insert the word "lawful" was clearly out of order.

The SPEAKER decided that the amendment was indivisible.

Mr. FILLMORE then modified the same so as simply to insert the word "lawful" before the word "votes."

And the question being then taken, the vote stood—yeas 96, nays 96—(a tie.)

And the SPEAKER voting in the affirmative, the vote stood—yeas 97, nays 96.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

A motion was here made to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 8, nays 167.

So the House refused to adjourn.

And the question then recurring on the amendment of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, as amended, and which is as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be authorized to report to this House such papers, and such of their proceedings, as they may desire to have printed by order of the House; and that they be instructed also to report forthwith which five of the ten individuals claiming seats from the State of New Jersey, received the greatest number of lawful votes from the whole State for Representatives in the Congress of the United States at the election of 1838 in said State, with all the evidence of that fact in their possession: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent or delay the action of said committee in taking testimony, and deciding the said case upon the merits of the election.

Mr RICE GARLAND inquired of the CHAIR whether, if the amendment was rejected, the question would not then be on the original resolution, as reported from the Committee of Elections?

The SPEAKER replied affirmatively.

And the question was then taken on the amendment, as amended, and decided in the affirmative, as follows—yeas 103, nays 90.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Biddle, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Jas. Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Crockett, Cushing, Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dillett, Edwards, Everett, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Gates, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Chas. Johnston, Wm C. Johnson, Kempshall, King, Lawrence, Lincoln, McCarty, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Underwood, P. J. Wagner, Edward D. White, John White, T. W. Williams, and Lewis Williams—90.

So the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

And the question recurring on the resolution as amended, the yeas and nays were, by general consent, dispensed with.

And the resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that, when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON demanded the yeas and nays on the motion, which were ordered, and were—yeas 62, nays 93. So the House refused to adjourn till Monday next.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN,

The House then adjourned.

Mr. CROSS of Arkansas presented the following petitions to the House on the 5th instant:

Of the citizens of Hot Spring county, for a new mail route.

Of Captain Belknap and other officers of the United States Army, for equalizing the pay of officers of the line with that of staff officers.

Of the citizens of Clark county, praying for an appropriation to improve the navigation of the Washita river.

Of James Shinault, for the passage of a bill authorizing him to enter a quarter section of land.

HOUSE OF REPREESNTATIVES,

SATURDAY, February 29, 1840.

which bills were severally read twice, and committed.

Mr. VANDERPOEL, from the same committee, reported a bill to provide for the support of the Military Academy for the year 1840; which was twice read, and on motion of Mr. V. the bill and the estimates accompanying, were ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Also, reported a bill for the relief of Chastillain and Ponvert; which was read twice, and committed.

On motion of Mr. VANDERPOEL, the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Samuel S. Anderson, and it was committed to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. RUSSELL, from the Committee of Claims, reported

A bill for the relief of Ebenezer A. Lester;

A bill for the relief of Nicholas Hedges;

A bill for the relief of Richard Booker;

A bill for the relief of John Howe;

A bill for the relief of John Wilkinson's legal representatives;

A bill for the relief of Thomas W. Taylor;

A bill for the relief of James Coxe;

A bill to amend an act entitled an act for the relief of Chauncey Calhoun;

A bill for the relief of Gamaliel E. Smith;

A bill for the relief of Garrett Vliet;

A bill for the relief of Nathaniel Goddard and others; which bills were severally twice read, committed, and ordered to be printed.

Also, reported a bill, from the same committee, for the relief of Ebenezer Lobdell; which was read twice; when

Mr. R. moved that it be committed to the Committee of the Whole, and be made the order of the day for this day.

Objection was made to this reference, as unusual; when,

On motion of Mr. DUNCAN, the question on this reference was taken by tellers; and it was decided in the negative—ayes 81, noes 86.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, the bill was then made the order of the day for to-morrow, and bill and report ordered to be printed.

Mr. R. from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of William Breyden, William Nicholas, the assignees of David Beard, Peter Mills, Lyman King, Stephen Arnan, Raymond A. Henderson, George Gale, Joel Byington, John Kelly, Lewis Bissell, Thomas Simpson; James Reynolds, Simon Green, and R. Hathaway and McHubbell, executor of W. A. J. Fleury; which were severally ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of Thomas Blanchard and William A. Whitehead; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. R. from the same committee, to which had been referred the petition of Israel H. Baker, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the claim of Joseph H. Baker, arising from the failure of a title to a lot of land purchased by him from the United States at the Zanesville land district in the State of Ohio, in July, 1831, and that the same be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, to the end that the purchase money may be returned according to the provisions of the act of 12th January, 1835; which was read, and agreed to.

Mr. R. also reported the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Charles Werner, claiming the sum of thirty dollars, deposited for him, by Henry Goldsmith, in the Treasury of the United States, on the 16th day of September, but which, by mistake, was credited to the said Goldsmith, and that the same be referred to the Commissioner of Patents, under the provisions of an act, entitled "An act to protect the progress of useful arts, and to repeal all acts and parts of acts hereafter made for the purpose," passed July, 1836; which was read, and agreed to.

Mr. R. also reported a resolution authorizing the Committee of Claims to appoint a clerk at the rate of four dollars per day, to facilitate the business of said committee; which was read, and agreed to.

Mr. BANKS, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Cornelius Tiers; which was twice read, and committed.

Also, an unfavorable report on the petition of

Dr. Thomas Gift; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DAWSON, from the same committee, reported

A bill for the relief of Josiah Thompson, late superintendent of the Cumberland road between Brownsville and Wheeling;

A bill for the relief of John Underwood; which were severally read and committed.

Also, an unfavorable report on the petition of Horace H. Dibble; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. HILL of North Carolina, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of William Bailey, survivor of Bailey and Delord; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. H. also, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Thomas Crown; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the same Committee, reported which were severally read twice, and committed.

On motion of Mr. C. the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John Dennis; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CURTIS gave notice that he would ask leave to introduce a bill to establish a system of uniform bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. HABERSHAM, from the same committee, reported a bill to amend an act entitled "an act to remit duties on certain goods destroyed by fire in the late conflagration in the city of New York, in Dec. 1835," passed July 7, 1838.

Also, a bill for the relief of George Willis;

A bill for the relief of Elliott Smith and Nathan Farnsworth;

which bills were severally read twice, and committed.

Mr. HABERSHAM, from the same committee, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the map of the southern coast from Tyler island to Hunting island, including a chart of the mouth of Savannah river, which was made from the surveys of Charles Wilkes, of the United States Navy, be printed under the direction of the Committee on Commerce, and that 5000 copies be published; one hundred of which shall be deposited in the Navy Department.

Mr. CLIFFORD moved to amend the resolution so as to have the map executed under the direction of the Printer of the House.

A debate here arose, in which Messrs. CURTIS, CLIFFORD, EVANS, and HABERSHAM, participated; when

Mr. SMITH of Maine obtained the floor and said, he was opposed to the amendment and to the printing also, because he believed it would incur a useless waste of money for a thing which he considered unnecessary. He then moved the previous question.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to lay the whole subject on the table; and on which

Mr. BRIGGS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 69, nays 96.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The question then recurring on the motion for the previous question, Messrs. Briggs and Montgomery were appointed tellers to ascertain if there was a second: result—ayes 67, noes 70.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. HABERSHAM here rose to address the House on the resolution, but was interrupted by

Mr. JONES of Virginia, who said, the time for the reception of reports having expired, he appealed to the House to take up the bill providing for the continuation of the office of the Commissioner of Pensions; which, he said, would expire on Wednesday next.

Mr. EVANS moved that the House continue to receive reports from committees, and moved a suspension of the rules for that purpose.

The question was taken by tellers, (Messrs. Hoffman and Ramsey acting as such,) who reported as the result, that there were—ayes 83, noes 59.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. CHARLES JOHNSTON of New York asked the consent of the House to introduce his resolution, published in Tuesdays paper, in relation to the contract between Mr. Langtree and the Clerk of the House of Representatives for furnishing stationery, &c.

Objection was made to its reception; when

Mr. J. moved to suspend the rules for the purpose.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and were—yeas 88, nays 79.

So the House refused to suspend the rules for the reception of the resolution.

Mr. J. W. JONES again asked the House to take up the bill for the continuance of the office of Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. TRIPLETT objected; when

Mr. JONES moved to suspend the rules for that purpose.

Mr. VANDERPOEL demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 131, nays 31.

So the rules were suspended.

The House then took up the Senate bill to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions until the 4th of March, 1842.

The question before the House was the amendment of Mr. Proffit, to reduce the salary of the Commissioner from $3,000 to $2,500; and he demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky, who was entitled to the floor on the above, offered an amendment to the amendment of Mr. Proffit, so as to make a reduction of salaries of officers of the General Government, pro rata, of five, ten, twelve, fifteen, twenty, and twenty-five per cent. according as salaries rise from $800 to $3,000.

Mr. PROFFIT accepted the amendment; but

The CHAIR said it was a distinct proposition, and could not be entertained.

Mr. DAVIS appealed from the decision of the Chair; but the appeal was not sustained by the House.

Mr. D. said that he asserted, when this subject was last up, that in supporting the principle of reduction, he was for striking a blow at the Executive power; for that branch of the Government had the employment of a large number of officers, and there were half a million of men looking to the Executive for the means of supporting themselves and families. Mr. D. proposed to reduce the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions from $3,000 to $2,500, and asked if it was not sufficient for that officer. He said, in one-half of our twenty-nine States and Territories the judicial and other officers received but $2,000, and some of them less than that sum; and inquired if it was expecting too much from the heads of bureaus to perform their duties for less than they now receive.

Mr. D. then spoke of the Independent Treasury, as proposed by the Administration; read extracts from the Hon. J. Buchanan's speech upon the subject, and commented thereon. Mr. D. yielded the floor to Mr. GRAVES, who moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. BANKS asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 71, nays 68.

So the House adjourned till Monday next.

IN SENATE

Monday, March 2, 1840.

Mr. TAPPAN presented a memorial from citizens of Ohio, praying Congress to take measures for the construction of a road from the valley of the Ohio to the valley of the Columbia river; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a memorial of citizens of New York, praying for the enactment of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a similar memorial, and

Mr. WRIGHT presented two similar memorials; which were severally referred to the same committee.

Mr. W. also presented a memorial of the Board of Underwriters of the city of New York, remonstrating against any alteration in the law respecting pilots; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STURGEON presented four memorials remonstrating against the use of bloodhounds in the Florida war; which were laid on the table.

Mr. ALLEN presented a memorial of 247 citizens of Ohio, praying for the enactment of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. A. also presented a memorial of 133 citizens of the Eighth Congressional District of Ohio, praying that the laws of the Union may be extended over the Oregon Territory; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Oregon Territory.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial of the United States Insurance Company, and of the Insurance Company of the State of Pennsylvania, praying to be indemnified for property seized and sequestrated by the Government of Hayti in 1811; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. B. also presented four memorials, remonstrating against the use of bloodhounds in the Florida war; which were laid on the table.

Mr. YOUNG presented a petition of citizens of Illinois, praying for the establishment of a post route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. Y. also presented a petition of citizens of township 34 north, range 15 east of the third principal meridian, praying a donation of land for school purposes; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. HENDERSON presented a memorial of the Legislature of Mississippi, praying for the adjustment of claims under the Choctaw treaty, and that pre-emptioners may be protected; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. H. also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Mississippi, praying for the establishment of a nation hospital at Vicksburg; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. H. also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Mississippi, in favor of the erection of a light-house between Pass Christian and Pass Mary Ann; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the petition of Mrs. Hester Hill; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented a memorial praying Congress to enact a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented a petition of citizens of the twelve miles square reserved for schools under the treaty of 1819 with the Cherokees, praying for indemnity for the loss of their improvements; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. C. also presented the petition of Sarah Bishop, widow of Colin Bishop, which was ordered to be filed with bill 91.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made an unfavorable report on the petition of John Nantz and others; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which was referred a bill to explain and amend the fifth section of an act passed the 30th day of June, 1840, for the better organization of the Marine Corps, reported the same without amendment, and that he was instructed to move its indefinite postponement, when it was taken up for consideration.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, accompanied by a report. The bill was ordered to a second reading, and one thousand additional copies of the report were ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill for the more easy collection of small bank notes within the District of Columbia;

The bill for the collection of bank notes of and under the denomination of twenty dollars, issued by banks within the District of Columbia; and

The bill to regulate the issuing and circulating of bank paper in the District of Columbia; were made the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution; which was considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing on the pension roll the name of John McClanahan of Missouri, who served in the regular army of the United States, and was wounded in the battle when Gen. St. Clair was defeated by the Indians in the Northwest.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. LUMPKIN submitted the following resolution for the consideration of the Senate:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives do adjourn their respective Houses, sine die, on Monday the ——— day of May next.

Mr. L. said he had been induced to call the attention of the Senate to this subject, from a sense of duty to his country and his constituents, arising from his own reflection, and without consultation with any one whatever. He indulged the hope that the subject would receive that early and respectful consideration from the Senate which its magnitude and importance demand.

He would see to it, that it should not be considered a trivial or unimportant subject. It was known to every one, that the sessions of Congress are becoming more and more protracted; and in direct proportion to their increase and duration, we find the legitimate business of legislation overlooked and neglected.

Sir, said Mr. L. we have now been three months in session; and what have we done, and what are we doing? Why, instead of doing the business of the people and the country, we are engaged in doing many things which ought not to be done, and things which delicacy forbids my naming here.

The attention of the people is diverted from the palpable remissness of their representatives in Congress, by being daily supplied, during our long sessions, with innumerable book speeches, manufactured for the current market of the public ear—speeches that contain every thing, except pertinent remarks on the subject upon which they are made.

Sir, (said Mr. L.) I am fully impressed with a sense of the delicacy of the subject of dwelling upon the evils of long Congressional speeches. But, sir, this is the true cause of the extension of our Congressional sessions, and, in my opinion, without any adequate benefit to the country. Sir, if we would, from this day forward, take Washington, Franklin, and Jefferson, for our models in speech making, and turn our attentions earnestly and deliberately to our duties of legislation in the true spirit of the founders of our glorious institutions, we should find plenty of time, between this and June, as contemplated by the proposed resolution, to do all the necessary business of the country, and return to our respective abodes, leaving the country and the public mind in quiet and peace from our ceaseless strifes, originated in the halls of legislation.

If John Randolph of Roanoake could speak from the dead, would he not tell you that you had been feeding long enough out of the public crib—that it was time for you to be at home, feeding out of your own cribs? Look out at your windows, sir. Do you not see the green grass? Do you not see the buds shooting forth? Do you not hear the birds sing? All nature seems to unite in admonishing us to duty and industry. The public service is already suffering for the want of a prompt and efficient discharge of our representative duties. After time for due reflection, sir, I shall again call up this subject for the action of the Senate, and I shall not abandon the ground which I have taken.

The resolution then being read by the Secretary of the Senate,

Mr. WEBSTER said he coincided with the Senator from Georgia, that the protracted sessions of Congress was a great and growing evil; and he would assure that gentleman of his hearty support of any measure that would have a tendency to remedy it.

Mr LUMPKIN returned his thanks to the Senator from Massachusetts, and assured him that upon this subject he was not influenced by party considerations, but was ready to unite with Senators from both sides of the Senate, in forming a party that would do the business of the country, and go home at the earliest practicable day.

DRAWBACK ON FOREIGN COAL.

The resolution reported some days since by the Committee on Commerce, in favor of allowing a drawback on foreign coal consumed in steam packets, was taken up for consideration, and was advocated by Messrs. WRIGHT and DAVIS, and opposed by Messrs. BUCHANAN, CLAYTON, and PHELPS; when,

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama, it was laid on the table—ayes 26, noes 16.

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 2d, 1840.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana, from the Select Committee on Printing, said he had been instructed to ask further time to report. The chairman [Mr. BLACK] had been called home on account of the indisposition of his family. The committee had finished taking testimony, but it was desirous that the charman should be present, and that a report should be postponed until his return, which would be on, or about, the 16th of the month. The motion for further time had met the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. R. GARLAND said the committee had gone on to take a great deal of testimony, upon which a difference of opinion would arise, and it was desirable that the chairman should be present before the report could be made.

After some further conversation as to the expediency of the extension of time, in which Messrs. LEWIS WILLIAMS, R. GARLAND, DAVIS of Indiana, W. C. JOHNSON, COOPER of Georgia, EVANS, and ADAMS, participated,

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana moved that the time for the committee to report be extended until the sixteenth of March.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved the 10th of March.

The question was then taken on the longest period first, and it was agreed to.

The CHAIR announced that the question first in order was the motion of Mr. CASEY to refer the memorial of the National Road Convention, held at Terre Haute, Indiana, to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill appropriating $150,000 to each of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to be expended on the Cumberland road.

The substitute of Mr. PICKENS for said instructions, as follows:

"And that the memorial be committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to consider the expediency of reporting a bill in favor of the measure."

And Mr. MARVIN'S amendment to the original proposition, and substitute for Mr. PICKENS'S amendment, as follows:

"And that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report bills in accordance with the estimates contained in the reports from the Chief Engineer, and the Chief of the Topographical Engineers, to the Secretary of War, and communicated to Congress by the President, making appropriations for the year 1840, for the continuation of the construction or improvements of harbors and roads, and the navigation of rivers, for which appropriations have been heretofore made."

Mr. LINCOLN objected that this being a day assigned by the rules of the House for the presentation of petitions, it was not in order to give precedence to the continuance of the debate on a petition formerly presented, over a call of the States for the presentation of petitions.

The SPEAKER decided that the petition having been taken up on a motion, on a preceding petition day, had precedence.

Mr. LINCOLN contended that the SPEAKER had placed a wrong construction upon the rule. The fifty-fourth rule was imperative on this subject: it says that petitions presented shall not be debated on the day of their being presented, nor on any day assigned by the House for the receipt of petitions after the first thirty days of the session. There was but one day in a fortnight set apart for the reception of petitions, and if the construction given by the SPEAKER should obtain, it would be impossible to present any petitions. It would abolish the right of petition at the door—they would be entirely excluded. The language of the rule was clear and explicit; and the uniform construction given to it by the predecessor of the present SPEAKER, was, that petitions laid over under debate, could not be taken up on the day set apart by the rule for the reception of petitions. If he had anticipated such construction, he could have armed himself with precedents in justification of his opinion, and in opposition to the present construction. He therefore most respectfully appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. ADAMS concurred with the opinion expressed by Mr. LINCOLN. In view of the difficulties thrown in the way of the presentation of petitions at former sessions, by a similar construction of the rule, he had subsequently, when these rules were under revision, introduced the present one to avoid these difficulties. If the construction of the SPEAKER be sustained, it would be impossible to get in petitions at all. He had some fifty or sixty which would not cause debate, on various subjects, which he would like to present, and have referred to appropriate committees.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman seemed to misapprehend his opinion. He did not say that petitions presented after the expiration of the first thirty days, which were laid over under debate, would come up as a matter of course on the next petition day. It would not come up unless the House expressly ordered it. The House took up the petition on the last petition day, and debated it; and it was in consequence of this decision of the House that this subject comes up as the unfinished business of the last petition day.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana moved the previous question on the appeal; which was seconded, and the main question ordered; which main question was, "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. LINCOLN demanded the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered.

Mr. BRIGGS inquired of the CHAIR whether, if the subject was laid over to-day, it could be taken up again, except by a vote of two-thirds.

The SPEAKER was of opinion that it would require a vote of two-thirds to take it up again.

The question was then taken, and the decision of the CHAIR was sustained—yeas 120, nays 61.

Mr. BELL, who was entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks, and spoke at some length on the subject before the House. Mr. B said that the President of the United States had expressed himself to the effect that he would not consider it expedient to veto any bill for this purpose, and referred to a letter in the Globe from three members of the House in relation to the Cumberland road. He understood it to be called forth, with a view to ascertain whether the Administration was opposed to the road; and if so, to have some evidence on which its hostility was predicated. He said, as the Secretary of the Treasury had placed the omission of an appropriation for this road upon the ground of the depletion of the Treasury, that they should retrench their own expenditures—that the starting point was the House of Representatives.

Mr. B. referred to several speeches which had been made by members of the Administration on the subject of the road, and said that in some portions of the country the Democracy opposed the measure; and in others, sustained it. Mr. B. said it might be asked of him, if he was friendly to internal improvements, why he opposed them? It was on the ground of inexpediency, as he had stated ten years ago—because there was no system in relation to them. People in the State of Tennessee denounced him as a Federalist—as an aristocrat—not because he voted for them, but because he associated with gentlemen here who did.

Mr. B. referred to General Jackson's veto of the Maysville road bill, and said the ex-President had only postponed the system of internal improvements until the national debt should be paid off; and that Mr. Van Buren had never, directly or indirectly, denied the power to appropriate money for that purpose. Jefferson, Madison, Washington, Monroe, the elder Adams, and Jackson, and the present President, all admitted the constitutionality of the power. Mr. B. concluded his remarks by a reference to the Florida and Creek wars, &c. when

Mr. CASEY rose, and offered the following modification of his resolution:

"That the petition be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill making a reasonable appropriation for the continuation of the National road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, for the year 1840, to be expended under the direction of the War Department, said appropriation to be subject to all the restrictions and conditions of former appropriations on said road."

Mr. CASEY observed that the object of the modification was, that the committee should act at their own discretion with regard to the amount of the appropriation they should report. He probably owed to the committee an apology for having proposed to instruct them at all. But he was led to adopt that course, because he was certain that without instructions, no report in relation to this subject would ever come from the committee. This was all that he wanted to say. Now, as the way for the reception of petitions was blocked up by this discussion, and as a great many gentlemen were anxious to present petitions, himself among the number, and as this discussion, which ought not to have occupied a week, had taken a very wide and unnecessary range, he would conclude by moving the previous question.

Mr. CRABB moved a call of the House; which was ordered, when

Mr. COLES moved an adjournment; which was decided (the count having been by tellers, Messrs. BRIGGS of Massachusetts, and JOHNSON of Tennessee) in the affirmative—ayes 86, noes 57; and

The House adjourned.

Upon the several questions growing out of the resolution of the Committee of Elections and the amendments thereto, on Friday, Mr. SMITH of Maine, and Mr. ALLEN of Ohio, who would have voted on opposite sides, were absent by arrangement.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, March 3, 1840.

Mr. NORVELL presented the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, praying an appropriation for the erection of a light-house, and the improvement of the harbor at Belvidere, on Lake St. Clair; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. N. also presented the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Wisconsin, for an appropriation for a road from Platville to the Mississippi river, and a grant of the alternate sections of public land on said road; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. N. also presented the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Wisconsin, for an appropriation for the survey of a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi river; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. PORTER presented the petition of John Hadley; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented the petition of the heirs and legal representatives of John Forbes, which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. LINN submitted documents in relation to the claim of John McClenahan, a soldier of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented the petition of John Thomas, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HENDRSON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill for the relief of the Eagle Railroad and Lumber Company; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to confirm the title to an island in the river Apalachicola, to the heirs and legal representatives of John Forbes, deceased; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE SENATE.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. LUMPKIN, in relation to the adjournment of the Senate, coming up in its order,

Mr. LUMPKIN said he did not wish that the subject should be taken up for consideration now, and therefore moved that it be laid on the table for the present, though he should take care it should not lie there long.

Mr. GRUNDY had but a word to say on this subject at present, and that was, that when the Senator intends to call up the resolution, he would give a day or two notice, so that the Senators might be in their places.

Mr. LUMPKIN then gave notice that he would call it up on Monday next.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The bill to relinquish to the State of Alabama the two per cent. fund reserved by the act for her admission into the Union, to be applied to the making of a road or roads leading to said State, was taken up, and, after being debated by Messrs. WHITE, CLAY of Alabama, NORVELL, KING, SMITH of Indiana, HUBBARD, LUMPKIN, and GRUNDY, was, on motion of Mr. G. postponed until to-morrow.

THE SPECIAL ORDER.

The resolutions of the Select Committee on the assumption by the Federal Government of the debts of the States was taken up, and Mr. FULTON addressed the Senate at length in favor of the principles of the report.

Mr. WEBSTER made some remarks on the speech of Mr. CALHOUN, in relation to the effect of a protective tariff on the exports and manufactures of the country; which were replied to by Mr. CALHOUN.

Mr. BUCHANAN then submitted some remarks in relation to certain alleged misrepresentations of his speech on the Independent Treasury bill, as to its effect on the wages of labor, which appeared in the published speech of Mr. DAVIS.

COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by their CLERK, announcing that they had passed the bill to revive and continue in force the office of Commissioner of Pensions, with an amendment. [The amendment was the reduction of the salary of the Commissioner, from $3,000 to $2,500 per annum.]

Mr. HUBBARD said, that as it would require but a few moments to dispose of the bill, he hoped that by general consent it would be now considered.

No objection being made,

Mr. HUBBARD said as it was very important that the bill should be passed this evening, he hoped that the amendment of the House would be concurred in.

Mr. SOUTHARD said he hoped the Senate would not concur. The bill, by its provisions, had greatly increased the duties of the office, while it reduced his compensation one-sixth. It was impossible for Mr. Edwards, or any other man, to perform the duties of the office as prescribed by the 4th section of the bill.

Mr. HUBBARD would only say that if this bill was not passed to-night, the Pension Office would be closed to-morrow. The office of the Commissioner expired by limitation this evening, and the Secretary of War would be constrained to issue his order, commanding its close, to morrow.

Mr. CRITTENDEN objected to the further consideration of the bill at this time, if there was to be any debate on it, and it was laid on the table.

Mr. DAVIS then replied to Mr. BUCHANAN, and after some further remarks between these gentlemen,

On motion by Mr. GRUNDY, the report of the Select Committee was informally passed over.

Mr. WRIGHT then moved that the Senate take up the bill to continue the Pension Office, and hoped that the bill might be permitted to pass without debate.

Mr. SOUTHARD said the bill must excite debate.

Mr. WRIGHT. As the Senator says the bill must excite debate, I withdraw my motion.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, March 3, 1840.

The first business in order was the following resolution offered on Saturday last by Mr. HABERSHAM, from the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved, That the map of the southern coast from Tybee island to Hunting island, including a chart of the mouth of Savannah river, which was made from the surveys of Charles Wilkes of the United States navy, be printed under the direction of the Committee on Commerce, and that 5,000 copies be published, one hundred of which shall be deposited in the Navy Department.

Mr. CLIFFORD moved to amend the resolution, by striking out all after the word resolved, and inserting,

That a map of the southern coast from Tybee island the Hunting island, including a chart of the mouth of the Savannah river, which was made upon the survey of Charles Wilkes, of the United States navy, be lithographed by order of this House, under the superintendence of the Topographical Bureau, and that 4,000 copies be published, 200 of which shall be deposited in the Navy Department for the use of the navy, and 200 in the Library of Congress for safe keeping.

Mr. HABERSHAM said that he had no power to accept of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine, because the resolution had been reported from the Committee on Commerce, and of course he had no control over it. It was, however, of no importance to him in what manner, or under whose direction, the chart was published, so that it was done in the cheapest form. When the subject came before the committee, it was deemed, in these economical times, impossible to let it pass without some attempt to have the work done in the cheapest possible way. And on inquiry, the committee discovered that a great saving might be effected, if the House would agree to the plan suggested. As, however, the publication of the chart required great accuracy, he was, on reflection, in favor of having it superintended by the Topographical Bureau. Mr. H. then adverted to the objections made on Saturday by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMITH,] and gave a long statement of the exports and imports of Maine and Georgia, with a view of showing the advantage that would arise from the publication of the map, in preventing the wreck of vessels, &c.

Mr. SMITH of Maine rising to reply,

Mr. CURTIS, after adverting to what appeared to him an unnecessary waste of time in this debate, proposed that if Mr. SMITH would withdraw his amendment, he would give him permission to modify the original resolution, so as to have the map published under the direction of the CLERK of the House.

Mr. CLIFFORD accordingly withdrew his amendment, and the original resolution was modified as suggested.

Mr. CURTIS then moved the previous question, but subsequently withdrew it at the request of Mr. SMITH, who wished to say a few words on the subject before the question was taken. Mr. S. then observed, that when he came into the House this morning, he found the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HABERSHAM] in full blast. He was not aware what course his argument had taken in the early part of the speech, but the latter part seemed wholly directed against him, (Mr. S.) and was intended to hold him up to the country as acting in opposition to the interests of his constituents, by opposing the publication of this map. He could not say by what code of ethics, or principles of policy, the gentleman from Georgia was governed in his conduct here. He did not know whether, when the interests of Georgia were concerned, the gentleman always went for those interests, regardless of the interest of the General Government and the whole country; but if he did so, he was governed by very different motives from those which guided him, (Mr. S.) He was willing to admit that the publication of the map might be of the smallest amount of importance to his constituents; but he was governed by higher motives than the mere local interests of his State. He had a public duty to perform to the country at large, and when he took his seat here, he did it with a firm determination to go for retrenchment. He was determined to stop every little stream which was issuing from the Treasury unnecessarily, and he would assure gentlemen that he was not to be deterred from that course, whenever, in his opinion, an appropriation required was not absolutely necessary.

Besides, he would ask, was this map a matter of pressing importance? Must the appropriation be made forthwith, now it was alledged the Treasury was bankrupt? And must we go and borrow money for the publication of this map? In his opinion, it was not a subject of pressing importance, and the publication would do as well a year hence as now, notwithstanding all the gentleman from Georgia had said. He could not believe that a single vessel would be lost, either from Maine or New England, for want of the map. He did not believe that the gentleman had ever found at the mouth of the Savannah river the wreck of a single vessel from Maine; neither did he believe that the mouth of that river would be blockaded up by the failure of publishing the map. Mr. S. concluded by observing that he would ever act on the great principle of opposing every appropriation not strictly required by the wants of the community; and he called upon those gentlemen who had preached so loudly about retrenchment, to come up and vote against this resolution. Mr. S. then renewed the motion for the previous question, which was seconded.

The main question was then ordered, being on the adoption of the resolution as amended; and the yeas and nays being ordered, the resolution was rejected—yeas 84, nays 95—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Banks, Barnard, Bell, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, Carroll, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Clifford, Corwin, Crockett, Curtis, Davee, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Dennis, Edwards, Evans, Fletcher, Rice Garland, Gates, Giddings, Granger, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hillen, Hoffman, Holmes, Howard, James, Jenifer, Kemble, Kempshall, King, Lawrence, Lincoln, Lowell, Marvin, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Ogle, Osborne, Parmenter, Pope, Ramsey, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Ridgway, E. Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Shepard, Storrs, Stuart, Sumpter, Waddy Thompson, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—84.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Bond, Boyd, A. G. Brown, Burke, Bynum, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Coles, Conner, Mark A. Cooper, Craig, Cross, Dana, John Davis, John W. The hour having expired, the SPEAKER announced the orders of the day, being the Senate bill providing for the removal of the raft in Red river, with the amendment of Mr. BIDDLE.

Mr. JONES appealed to the courtesy of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to allow him to call up the bill for continuing the office of Commissioner of Pensions. He reminded the House that, after to-morrow, the office would be no longer in existence, and should there be any objection to the passage of the bill, it would be productive of serious inconvenience. Mr. J. then had read at the CLERK's table a communication from the Secretary of War on that subject, showing the urgent necessity for the immediate passage of the bill.

Mr. RICE GARLAND objected to this bill having precedence of that for the removal of the raft in Red river. He would inform the House that he also had received a communication from the Secretary of War, showing that if the bill were not passed immediately, Government must lose a great amount of money.

Mr. JONES moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of taking up the bill continuing the office of Commissioner of Pensions. This motion was agreed to, and the bill taken up, the question being on the amendment of Mr. PROFFIT, reducing the salary of the Commissioner from $3,000 to $2,500.

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky, being entitled to the floor, said that; owing to the necessity of immediate action on the bill, he would waive all further remarks, and move the previous question.

The second to the previous question and the call having been carried, the main question was put, and decided in the affirmative, yeas 89, nays 85, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. John W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Beaty, Bell, Blackwell, Bond, Boyd, Brewster, Brockway, Albert G. Brown, Bynum, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Clark, Clifford, Coles, Conner, Corwin, Craig, Crary, Davee, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Deberry, Dillett, Doan, Edwards, Floyd, Fornance, Rice Garland, Gerry, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Green, Griffin, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Henry, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jameson, Charles Johnston, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Kempshall, Leadbetter, Lincoln, McClellan, Montgomery, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Ogle, Parish, Parris, Proffit, Ramsey, Rariden, Reynolds, Samuels, Shepard, Simonton, Albert Smith, Thomas Smith, Stanly, Starkweather, Steenrod, Storrs, Stuart, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweeny, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Triplett, Trumbull, Turney, Underwood, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, John White, Wick, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, and Sherrod Williams—89.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, Atherton, Banks, Barnard, Biddle, Briggs, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Calhoun, Carroll, Chinn, Chittenden, Mark A. Cooper, Crockett, Cross, Curtis, Cushing, Dana, Edward Davies, John Davis, Dawson, Dennis, Doig, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Evans, Fine, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hill of Virginia, Hillen, Hoffman, Holleman, Howard, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, King, Lawrence, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, MuCulloch, Mallory, Marchand, Miller, Monroe, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Parmenter, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Pope, Prentiss, Rayner, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Saltonstall, Shaw, Strong, Philip F. Thomas, Toland, Vanderpoel, Edward D. White, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Worthington—86.

The amendment having then been ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time,

Mr. PROFFIT asked some gentlemen better acquainted with the matter than himself, to give him some information as to what was the object of transferring the duties which formerly devolved on the Secretary of the Navy, to the Commissioner of Pensions, as was done by this bill.

Mr. STARKWEATHER rose to move a reconsideration of the vote just taken on the amendment.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman would then have to move two reconsiderations: first, of the vote by which the bill had been ordered to a third reading; and, secondly, of the vote by which the amendment had been adopted.

Mr. STARKWEATHER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill had been ordered to a third reading.

Some conversation here ensued between Messrs. ADAMS, STARKWEATHER, and the SPEAKER as to the mode in which the question was again to be got at—of which, however, the Reporter could scarcely hear a word. It resulted in the withdrawal, by Mr. STARKWEATHER, of the motion he had submitted.

And the question recurring on the final passage of the bill,

Mr. HOFFMAN said that, if in order, he would now move to recommit the bill for the purpose of striking out the 4th section. That section provided that the Naval Pension Fund, which had always been under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, should now be transferred to the charge of the agent—Mr. Edwards. In the first place, that pension fund did not come out of the ordinary resources of the Government. It had been created by the gallantry of the navy in the war of 1812, '13, and '14; and they had always looked to the Secretary of the Navy as their trustee to fulfil the objects for which the fund had been created. If the 4th section should now be stuck out, there was another bill coming from the Senate which had especial reference to the naval pension fund of the United States; and when this bill came up, there would be time to discuss its provisions, and to make such arrangements as to the manner in which the fund should hereafter be managed, as might be thought advisable. This was the only motive which he now had in moving to recommit the bill for the purpose of striking out the 4th section. It might give much dissatisfaction to the officers of the navy that the guardian to whom they had a right to look should be released from all responsibility—that the fund should be mingled up with the other funds of the Government, and to be accounted for, not to the Secretary of the Navy, but to the Secretary of War.

Mr. JONES, of Virginia, would give a brief explanation in regard to this proposition. He was desirous to have done so before, and would have done so had it not been for the necessity which existed that the bill should be acted upon without delay. It was true that a portion of this fund had been created under the enactment of Congress, and consisted of prize money taken in the war of 1812, '13, and 14, and which was set apart for this purpose. Another portion, called the Naval Hospital Fund, consisted of a portion of the wages of officers and seamen belonging to the navy. This fund, heretofore, had been under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, but, owing to a communication from that officer himself, (Mr. J. supposed,) the matter was taken up in another branch of the Legislature, and this section of the bill was incorporated into it. [Mr. J. here read an extract from the report of the Department, to show that the section had been introduced at the instance of the Secretary of the Navy himself.] The labor imposed upon the Secretary of the Navy was so great that he could not discharge the duties, and the consequence was that they must, of necessity, be devolved upon a subordinate clerk. In the present case, the proposition was to put the fund in charge of the Commissioner of Pensions, where there would be a sufficient responsibility; and, although it would not be direct to the Secretary of the Navy, yet it would be direct to an officer of equal grade with the Secretary of the Navy. The fund would be in the charge of a naval officer who had performed faithful public service, and there would be more responsibility, and a prospect of a better discharge of the duty than under existing arrangements, coupled to the additional prospect of a uniformity of decision through the whole system of pension laws.

Mr. J. then moved the previous question, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. HOFFMAN, and on the pledge of that gentleman to renew it.

Mr. HOFFMAN said that the very difficulty which he had apprehended from want of time had now presented itself. It was important that this bill should be passed to-day; and neither the paience nor the time of the House would admit of a satisfactory investigation now. It was for this reason that he had submitted his motion in such general terms. If the House should heafter think that this 4th section was right, they could, after having come to a deliberate judgment, incorporate it into the naval pension fund bill, when it should come up, in the course of two or three weeks. If, however, the House should now pass the section without understanding its effect, or listening to the arguments which might be urged against it, it would be too late, when the naval pension fund bill should come up, to make the desirable alteration. He did not, therefore, mean to offer any substitute at present; he merely wished the House to strike out the section, so as to give time for consideration.

This proposition contemplated a very important change, so far as it regarded the interests of the navy; and yet the change might be right or might be wrong. It was a most important change—pregnant with good as with evil to that body. The amendment had never passed through the Committee on Naval Affairs, which was the appropriate committee to have passed judgment upon it, and to have presented it to the House. Now, if the House would agree to strike out the section, they would be in the same position as though it had never been introduced. It might be adopted precisely as it stood, or it might be rejected hereafter, when the naval pension fund bill should be under consideration. But it it seemed unfair and unkind that a measure of so much importance to the navy should be disposed of in this summary way, without even time for inquiry, or without having passed through that channel to which they had a right to look for the guardianship of their interests.

Mr. H. being then about to renew the demand for the previous question, in redemption of his pledge to Mr. JONES,

Mr. MONROE urgently appealed to Mr. H. to withhold the demand—which Mr. H. said he could not do, being pledged to renew it.

And the previous question being then again demanded—

The SPEAKER said the main question would be on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOFFMAN moved to strike out the fourth section.

The SPEAKER said it could only now be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOFFMAN said if universal consent could not be obtained, he must move to recommit the bill.

Mr. McKAY rose and objected.

Mr. LAWRENCE hoped the objection would be withdrawn. It was very important that this bill should be passed to-day; because the commission of the Commissioner of Pensions would expire. The House had not had any opportunity of examining the fourth section. That section seemed to him to carry with it very important powers, and he confessed he was not, at this time, ready to vote upon it. It might be wright or wrong—he did not say. But, at the same time, he desired that it might be stricken out now, and introduced into some other bill if it be right. At all events, time should be allowed for inquiry.

Mr. McKAY declining to withdraw his objection—

Mr. HOFFMAN moved a recommitment.

Mr. TURNEY inquired if, after the previous question had been called, a motion to recommit was in order?

The SPEAKER answered in the negative.

Some conversation followed between Messrs. JONES, CLIFFORD, BRIGGS, and BANKS, on the point of order,

When, the question being put, the demand for the previous question was seconded.

And the main question was ordered to be now taken.

And the main question being on the passage of the bill, was decided by yeas and nays—yeas 157, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, J. Allen, John W. Allen, H. J. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Biddle, Blackwell, Bond, Boyd, Briggs, Brockway, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, S. M. Butler, William O. Butler, Calhoun, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Clifford, Coles, Connor, M. A. Cooper, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Curtis, Cushing, Dana, Davee, Davies, John Davis, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Dennis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Edwards, Ely, Evans, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, James Garland, Gates, Gentry, Gerry, Goggin, Green, Griffin, Habersham, Hand, W. S. Hastings, J. Hastings, Henry, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Hunt, Jameson, Charles Johnston, Joseph Johnson, C. Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kempshall, Lawrence, Leadbetter, Lewis, Lincoln, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Mason, Miller, Mitchell, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Calvary Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Ogle, Parish, Parmenter, Paynter, Petrikin, Pope, Prentiss, Ramsey, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Ridgway, Robinson, Edward Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Samuels, Sergeant, Shaw, Shepard, Simonton, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Storrs, Strong, Stuart, Sumter, Sweeny, Taylor, Philip F. Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Peter J. Wagner, Watterson, Weller, Edward D. White, John White, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Worthington—157.

NAYS—Messrs. Rice Garland, Jenifer, King, Monroe, Morgan, Proffit, Rhett, and Christopher H. Williams—8.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. W. THOMPSON then, after a few remarks, moved a reconsideration of the vote just taken, for the purpose of amending it, by striking out the fourth section.

After some remarks from Mr. MONROE, in favor of the motion,

Mr. HUBBARD called for the previous question; which being ordered,

The question of reconsideration was decided in the negative—yeas 67, nays 83.

The bill from the Senate, making an appropriation for the removal of the Red River raft, was then taken up, the question being on the motion of Mr. BIDDLE to refer the bill to the Committee on Roads and Canals, with instructions to inquire into and report upon the circumstances connected with the advance made by the Bank of Arkansas to the Superintendent of the work, and its expenditure by him.

Mr. BEATTY of Pennsylvania, who was entitled to the floor, having moved an adjournment when this subject was last before the House, rose and said, that although he had moved the adjournment, it had not been with any intention of detaining the House by a long speech, as he believed every honest man in the House was tired listening to speeches made for home consumption, or against time. What he had to say he should comprise in a very few words. The removal of the raft on Red river, said Mr. B. and the opening of the navigation of that important stream, must, in its consequences, extend to the waters of the Ohio, since they both empty into the Mississippi river, which is a connecting link between them. Large appropriations have heretofore been made for improving the navigation of the Ohio, and many of the streams connected with it; and I now ask the attention of the House to the importance of improving the navigation of one of its head waters. I mean the Alleghany river. The extension of that navigation from Pittsburg, in Pennsylvania, to Olean Point, in the State of New York, will, I am persuaded, be a measure of very great importance, not only to the country immediately adjacent, but ultimately to a great part of the Union. There are at this time thirteen States interested in this improvement. It has long been the intention of the Government that an appropriation should be made for this object, and a bill was reported for that purpose, but during the last session of Congress it could not be reached; and from the course that business now takes in this House, or rather from a course pursued by some gentlemen which prevents business from being done, I am led to embrace the present as the only favorable opportunity likely for some time to occur, of bringing this subject before the notice of the House. Should the contemplated improvement be carried into effect, the effect will be—as any gentleman by an inspection of the map can immediately perceive—that a continued line of navigation will be extended up the Allegany to the Genessee Valley canal—a work which the enterprise and perseverance of the people of the State of New York are now pushing rapidly to its completion. When this middle link of the chain shall have been supplied, there will be a water communication, extending, without interruption, for twelve thousand miles through the interior of the United States. An object like this well deserves the name of a national enterprise, for all parts of the country are more or less interested in its completion. When this vast internal navigation is complete, not only agricultural produce, but troops, artillery, and munitions of war, can rapidly be conveyed from remote points on the Atlantic coast all the way to New Orleans, without being exposed to the dangers of the sea. Who does not perceive what an invaluable advantage this will be, should the nation be involved in war. I invite to this subject, particularly, the attention of a class of gentlemen who have heretofore been opposed to works of this description: I mean the gentlemen of the South. They cannot fail to perceive that, by completing a line of internal navigation of this extent, they open a path for their raw material to the Northern manufacturers, whence it can go abroad in an improved form, and with enhanced value, without being exposed to the enemy by sea, in time of war. I trust that these intelligent gentlemen will give to the subject that serious attention which its importance demands, and that they will consider this as a fit time in which to avow their conviction of its utility.

Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to make a speech, but merely to call the attention of the House to this subject. I am fully aware there are many gentlemen present who understand it, and can explain it much better than I; and I cannot but hope that it will not be overlooked. And now, as I know that it is not the pleasure of gentlemen to listen to long speeches on a subject like this, I will conclude what I have to say by moving the previous question.

Mr. BIDDLE, who spoke with earnestness in opposition to the bill, as setting an evil precedent calculated to lead subordinate officers to violate their instructions, and those interested in their doing so, to presume upon the lenity of the Government. He dwelt also on the constitutional objection to a bill appropriating money originating in the Senate.

Mr. POPE admitted that there was weight in the last objection, but wished that subject reserved, to be embodied in a declaratory bill. He then advocated the appropriation, and dwelt on the great utility of the work, and the loss which must ensue should the work be suspended. Mr. P. closed by moving a reference of the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means; on which question he demanded the previous question. He withdrew this demand, however, under the pledge that it should be renewed by

Mr. PETRIKIN, who said he was opposed to all these appropriations. He considered them nothing more nor less than a continued drain on the whole nation, for the benefit of a set of speculators, who had advanced money to go on with the improvement of the raft, that they might sell their fine cotton land above it, which they had purchased for a dollar and a quarter, for fifteen and twenty dollars an acre. We have been told, said Mr. P. that this raft has been removed; yet we are asked for an appropriation to remove it. Millions have been expended by an unfaithful officer, and this House sanctions it. If any one doubts it, I pledge myself to produce the proof. I am not going to make a speech about General Harrison or Alexander Hamilton, and move the previous question.

[Cries of "no, no!"]

Mr. P. I always keep my word, sir.

Mr. CROSS of Arkansas wished much an opportunity to explain; but the rule was enforced, which forbids all debate after the previous question has been moved.

Mr. GARLAND suggested to Mr. BIDDLE to modify his instructions; but Mr. B. declined.

Mr. GARLAND then asked a division of the question, so that it might be taken first on the commitment, and then on the instructions.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON now moved to lay the whole subject on the table; but the House, by yeas and nays, rejected the motion—yeas 63, nays 92.

But, before any question was taken on the commitment of the bill,

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 3d, 1840.

GENTLEMEN: Be pleased to insert in the Globe, that upon the several questions arising out of the resolutions of the Committee of Elections, and the amendments thereto, on Friday last, Mr. FLETCHER, of Vermont, and Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, who, if present, would have voted on opposite sides, were absent by mutual agreement, having left the House, not expecting the question would have been taken that evening.

Respectfully,
ISAAC FLETCHER.

Messrs. BLAIR AND RIVES.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, March 4, 1840.

Mr. LINN presented a memorial of citizens of the State of Indiana, praying that the laws of the Union may be extended over the Oregon Territory; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Oregon Territory.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial of citizens of New York, praying for the enactment of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a petition from citizens of Philadelphia, praying for the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented eight memorials of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. T. presented a memorial remonstrating against the use of bloodhounds in the Florida war; which was laid on the table.

Mr. T. also presented a memorial from citizens of New York, praying for a reduction of postage on letters; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. T. also presented a memorial from citizens of New York, praying to prohibit the use of ardent spirits in the army, navy, &c.; which was laid on the table.

Mr. MERRICK presented a memorial of William McMahon; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the petition of the Administrator of John Judge; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ALLEN presented the memorial of the Democratic Association of Washington city, praying a renewal of the charter of the city of Washington, with certain modifications; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented two memorials of citizens of the city of Washington, praying for a renewal of the charter of said city, with certain modifications; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MERRICK asked that the above memorials might be printed.

Mr. ALLEN said that one of the memorials had been already ordered to be printed, and as they were all a similar tenor, he saw no propriety in reprinting the same matter.

Mr. MERRICK said it was the printing of the names of the signers of the memorials he wished. There was considerable diversity of sentiment among the citizens on the subject of this memorial, and it had been intimated that many of the signatures were fictitious, and had no representatives in existence. He hoped, therefore, the memorials, with the signatures, would be printed.

Mr. NORVELL hoped that the motion to print the names of the memorialists, as well as one of the copies of the memorial, would be adopted. One prominent object of the memorialists was an extension of the right of suffrage within this District. They desired Congress to give to them a right to vote for the public officers, for the municipal authorities by whom they were ruled. The object was laudable, and there could be no objection to the printing of the names of those who seek it.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he had no objection to the printing, but he would suggest that the names on the memorials formerly presented, should also be printed; which was accordingly ordered.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the memorial of the Latter Day Saints, commonly called Mormons, submitted a report, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial in this case, and that the memorialists have leave to withdraw the papers which accompany their memorials.

Mr. W. gave notice that he would call up the report on Monday next.

Mr. W. from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of William P. Rathbone, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. W. from the same committee, reported a bill to extend for a longer time the several acts now in force for the relief of insolvent debtors of the United States; which was read, and passed to a second reading, and, by unanimous consent, read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, reported the bill supplementary to an act to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases, without amendment.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the executor of Thomas Cooper, deceased; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the relief of the securities of Archibald Sneed, deceased.

The bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make an arrangement or compromise with any of the sureties on bonds given to the United States by Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the customs for the port of New York, was taken up as in Committee of the Whole, and after being discussed by Messrs. WALL, WEBSTER, PRENTISS, WRIGHT, and BETTS, was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. TAPPAN submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the 47th rule be amended so as in the last paragraph thereof to read:

"Two reporters for each of the daily papers, and one reporter for each tri-weekly paper, printed and published in the city of Washington, whose names shall be communicated in writing, by the editors of those papers to the Secretary of the Senate, and who shall confine themselves to the seats now provided for them.

Mr. CALHOUN submitted the following:

Resolved, That a ship or vessel on the high seas, in time of peace, engaged in a lawful voyage, is, according to the laws of nations, under the exclusive jurisdiction of the State to which her flag belongs, as much so as if constituting a part of its own domain.

Resolved, That if such ship or vessel should be forced, by stress of weather or other unavoidable cause, into the port of a friendly power, she would, under the same laws, lose none of the rights appertaining to her on the high seas, but, on the contrary, she and her cargo and persons on board, with their property, and all the rights belonging to their personal relations, as established by the laws of the State to which they belong, would be under the protection which the laws of nations extend to the unfortunate under such circumstances.

Resolved, That the brig Enterprise, which was forced unavoidably by stress of weather into Port Hamilton, Bermuda Island, while on a lawful voyage on the high seas from one part of the Union to another, comes within the principles embraced in the foregoing resolutions; and that the seizure and detention of the negroes on board by the local authorities of the Island was an act in violation of the laws of nations, and highly unjust to our citizens to whom they belong.

COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS.

Mr. PIERCE, chairman of the Committee on Pensions, move to take up the bill, as amended by the other House, to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. PIERCE said: With all due reference to the opinion of the House of Representatives upon questions of this character, I shall feel it to be my duty to vote against concurring in the amendment; but at this moment of strong professions of principles of economy and retrenchment, I have little hope of being sustained in my opposition, and shall attempt no labored argument to lead the minds of other gentlemen to the conclusion at which my own has already arrived. But there are some facts which I feel it to be my duty to state in justification of the committee under whose direction I reported the bill, and which, in ordinary times, I should expect would not be without weight here. Of the ability, fidelity, and untiring industry with which the officer alone to be affected by this reduction has discharged the duties devolved upon him, I have nothing to say; they are known and acknowledged by all persons who have had any intercourse with the Pension Office. You find him there early and late, and, what is much more material, you almost always find him right. I say this, because the committee of which I am a member have never, to my recollection, found occasion to reverse his decision under the regulations which the interests of the Government and the ends of justice have rendered it indispensable for him to adopt. We have, it is true, granted pensions where he has refused to grant them, but we have done it by setting aside, in individual cases of strong equity, regulations from which he could, with no safety, depart. Twenty-two years have now elapsed since he has been at the head of the Pension Bureau, either as chief clerk or Commissioner, which office was created in 1833. During that period, more than sixty-eight thousand cases have been examined and admitted, or rejected, exclusive of invalid applications. The labor and research which has been required for the faithful and just discharge of this duty, can hardly be appreciated by any man who has not been in the habit of examining pension claims, with the voluminous testimony which accompanies almost every case. In disposing of the vast number of claims to which I had before adverted, it was impossible that the Commissioner should avoid provoking the displeasure of many claimants, their agents, attorneys, and friends. He has done it, I know, from letters of complaint from my own constituents, who will, perhaps, blame me for what I am about to say. In my judgment, from a careful examination of a large number of cases, he has done it in a faithful and fearless discharge of duties which he owed to the Government, as well as to individuals.

Sir, I have been astonished at the amount of labor which this officer has been able to accomplish, and yet more at the facility and promptness with which he can turn to the grounds of decision of all cases that have been adjudicated. It may not be improper for me to state, at this moment of patriotic ardor and feverish excitement upon the subject of retrenchment, that, during the session preceding the last, and near its close, a large number, I think more than a hundred and fifty bills, came up to this chamber for concurrence. I then, as now, was a member of the Committee on Pensions, and I bestowed upon those cases, at that period of the session, all the time and strength I could command. In many cases there were printed reports setting forth reasons that were decisive upon the premises assumed. But I doubted the justness of these premises, and sent many of the cases to Mr. Edwards for the grounds on which they were rejected there, and I received prompt answers, showing such discrepancy between the evidence furnished there, and the original application, and the evidence presented to Congress, or such record evidence as proved most of the claims, beyond a question, to be groundless. The Senate will, perhaps, remember the result. Some fifteen or twenty of those claims, based upon grounds of equity, received the favorable report of the committee, and were passed by the Senate. It is but just to say, that chiefly to the care and intelligence of this officer, and the facility with which he was able to furnish the grounds of his decisions, is to be attributed the fact that this mass of unjust claims were rejected; a number which would have probably demanded twenty thousand dollars for the present, and, perhaps, not less than two hundred thousand dollars prospectively. And now, sir, what do you propose to do? You propose to reduce the salary of this officer the sum of five hundred dollars, while you leave the salaries of other officers, of not more laborious or responsible stations, where they are. Let me say it is not merely intelligence and industry that is required there. Integrity in that officer might have been bartered within the last three years during the monstrous influx of large claims for tens and fifty thousands of dollars. Sad experience in this Government has proved that integrity may be successfully assailed, even in positions of the highest trust. Lucre is, at the present day, the god of general idolatry; and when we have a man in a station of this importance, upon whose decisions millions depend, my judgment teaches me that, as sensible and practical men, we had better not, for the paltry consideration of five hundred dollars annually, risk the great interests lodged in that bureau. But if the present incumbent will consent to continue in the office at twenty-five hundred dollars a year, can we, in the exercise of a spirit of just liberality and a judicious appreciation of faithful labors, reduce his salary? I consider this reduction most inauspicious, both as to the time and the person. By the fourth section of the bill, you propose to transfer the business which has been hitherto done in the Navy Department to this office—a change demanded by a variety of considerations—looking to the protection of the public revenue, and prompt action upon the applications of indigent and meritorious claimants. Although the number of pensioners for Revolutionary service is daily decreasing, except under the act of granting pensions to widows, yet the amount of labor will not be lessened for the next twelve months, at least; and there are a large number of claims under the act of 1832—probably twelve or fifteen hundred—which ought to be taken up for re-examination, with the light of additional rolls and record evidence, which the Department has obtained since their suspension. I have no doubt that many of those cases were just, and that a re-examination will show that the claimants, if living, and, if not, their widows or heirs, are entitled to the benefit of that act. But this the Commissioner cannot do, and proceed with the current business of the office, for at least a year to come. The bill proposes to continue the office for three years only, and those three years must be, it is perfectly obvious, as the last three have been, devoted to constant labor. Although you transfer the clerk from the Navy Department to the Pension Office, you still add greatly to the responsibility of the Commissioner. To this point I will read the testimony of the Secretary of the Navy. In his last annual report the Secretary says:

"The multiplication of these laws, and the various constructions placed upon them at different times, seem to indicate the propriety of adopting a less complicated system. I would also take the occasion to state that, whatever disposition may be made of the subject, it has become necessary to relieve the head of the Department from the labor and responsility of this portion of his duites.

"Almost every application for a pension involves the necessity of a close and critical examination of testimony, together with a reference to various laws, and the time required to do this as it ought to be done, materially interferes with other and indispensable avocations."

Four weeks since, the Senate, upon my motion, took this bill up out of its order, and passed it; but the hopes that were then indulged have not been realized. The act of 1837 expired yesterday, the business of the office is suspended, its doors are closed, and I am not unmindful of the strong objections to sending the bill back, still I should do injustice to my own convictions to yield to those objections. Let us do what is manifestly right, and leave the responsibility of the wrong where it belongs. If this proposition were embraced in a general scheme of reduction which would be relatively just, I should, perhaps, have nothing to object; though I think very erroneous impresions are entertained with regard to the amount of labor performed in the various offices here, the ability and diligence which the subordinate officers bring to the performance of that labor, and the amount of salary that is indispensable for the support of their families. I cannot omit this opportunity to remark that my acquaintance with those officers has led me to form a high estimate of their characters. They are no idlers; they earn their bread. Go into any of the various offices, and you will find no deficiency of those qualities which constitute the efficient officer and good citizen.

Upon this favorite theme of retrenchment, I have only to say, that, when gentlemen will move upon this subject with enlarged views and just objects, they shall not want my humble aid. Fortunately for myself, I have the honor to represent here, in part, a constituency who judge men by their acts, and not by their words. To them I commit the record of my votes in both wings of this Capitol; they will be somewhat more enduring and satisfactory than any professions which may pass away with the breath that utters them.

Is not the inequality, not to say injustice, of this measure obvious and glaring? What are the facts in relation to your other officers of similar grade? In 1831, a gentleman had charge of the Indian bureau at a salary of $1,600; in 1832, the office of Commissioner of Indian Affairs was established at a salary of $3,000; in 1834, the gentleman at the head of the Patent Office received $1,500; in 1836, the office of Commissioner of Patents was established, and the salary fixed at $3,000. The same salaries are paid to your Register, your Comptrollers, and your Auditors. Now, sir, I hazard nothing in saying that there is nothing which, upon grounds of relative ability, relative labor, and relative fidelity, can warrant the proposed distinction against this veteran officer. If salaries are to be reduced, let them be reduced together, and upon a fair and just scale, and do not direct all the force of your spirit of retrenchment against this individual, who, in his youth, performed good service, both in your army and navy, and who may be found in his office at all seasons—in autumn, winter, spring, and sultry summer—from eight o'clock in the morning until late in the afternoon, devoting his energies, his great experience, and his thorough knowledge of this important branch of public business, to your service.

Mr. HUBBARD remarked that on yesterday, when this bill came from the House of Representatives, he moved that the Senate concur in the proposed amendment. He was at the time aware that his honorable colleague, who had this bill in charge, was necessarily absent from his seat; and, without knowing his views at all upon the subject, he moved a concurrence. He did this from a full conviction that a regard to the public interests demanded an immediate action upon this bill. The office of Commissioner of Pensions, it was known, would expire with the expiration of the day. He then stated, what is now history, that if this bill was not passed before the adjournment of the Senate, the office would be closed before the reassembling of the Senate; that it was, therefere, of the utmost importance that the bill should be passed, and be passed without delay.

This, however, was not done. He had now heard his colleague, and he fully appreciated the feelings and sentiments which governed him. He was perfectly aware that the committee of which he is chairman, had reported the bill precisely as it had passed the Senate; and, as far as it respects the salary of the Commissioner, the bill reported was in perfect accordance with the existing law. He was perfectly aware, also, that his colleague was not the advocate of hizh salaries. His votes since the commencement of the present session offered sufficient evidence of that fact; and he differed not at all from him in the estimation he had given of the faithful and valuable services of the Commissioner of Pensions. Notwithstanding all this, he was now, as he was yesterday, in favor of concurring with the amendment proposed by the House of Representatives; and he would state the considerations which must control his vote. This bill passed the Senate about four weeks ago. It came from the House just as the office of Commissioner of Pensons, was expiring. He knew not what had occasioned this delay. The only amendment proposed by that branch was to reduce the salary of the Commissioner from three thousand to twenty-five hundred dollars. He knew not, nor did he wish to know, the particular reasons which had induced the House to agree to that amendment. It had been done; and, for one, he was not disposed, at this hour, to return the bill again to the House. He could not tell whether they would insist upon their amendment, or whether they would recede from it, or whether they would not take up the bill until another four weeks had expired. He would not, therefore, return the bill to the House of Representatives, under existing circumstances, but he would concur, and concur at once; and if injustice should be meted out to the Commissioner by the adoption of the amendment, it will be in the power of Congress to correct the error in some future legislation. And why would he not now concur in the amendment of the House? Why would he not send the bill back to the House? For this reason: the office is now closed—the doors are now barred—and the old men and women who have claims under your existing laws, cannot gain admittance to present them at the appropriate department. The whole pension system is now suspended; and he would not, therefore, if he could prevent it, delay the passage of this bill a single moment. It should have been done before the adjournment on yesterday. The suspension of any one branch of the public service should not have been permitted for a single hour.

In conclusion, he would again say, that he fully appreciated the views of his colleague; but as he deprecated further delay—as he regarded it as most injurious to the public service, and most prejudicial to the particular interests of those seeking to obtain pensions—he should feel constrained to give his vote in favor of concurring in the amendment.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama was willing to accord all that was said by his friend [Mr. PIERCE] from New Hampshire in favor of the ability and faithfulness of the Commissioner. According to the statement made, he had originally received $2,500 for his duties, and he did not presume he was more faithful now than then, or had more labor to perform. That he was competent and experienced Mr. C. was willing to admit; but, at the same time, he was not prepared to admit that he was the only man that was so. Able and efficient men might be had to do the duties for the sum offered by the House. The Judges of his own State got less, and the Secretary of State five hundred dollars less; and why was it that a clerk should be better compensated than the highest judicial authorities of the States? The time for retrenchment with him was whenever the question was presented for his action, and he should now call on the other side of the House—to those who had been loud in their professions on the scorce of economy; who had descanted so eloquently on the subjects of reform and retrenchment—to rally to his side, and aid him in carrying out the measure, and he could assure them they should have his aid and support in all similar measures.

Mr. GRUNDY spoke of the official worth of the Commissioner, from his own knowledge, while acting as attorney Genral; his attention to his duties was such as to commend him to the consideration of the country. He did not think $3,000 too high for the services, especially in a city where living was so high as in this; but he could not consent to postpone the bill. As far as his vote was concerned, he should feel compelled to give it in favor of a concurrence with the amendment of the House.

Mr. WRIGHT thought that to make the reduction in an insulated case was wrong, but he hoped the Senate would concur in the amendment made by the House, as the doors of the office were now closed, and the pensioners could not be attended to in consequence of it.

Mr. PIERCE said the bill had passed the Senate four weeks since, and has been returned now with but this amendment. He was for sending it back again, and for letting the responsibility of closing the office rest where it belongs. If the House chooses, let them keep it four weeks longer, and justify themselves to their constituents if they can.

Mr. WALL wished to say a word in explanation of his vote. He came there this morning with an intention to vote against concurrence in the amendment; but the fact of the office being closed had changed that determination. He never could consent to increase labor, and at the same time diminish the salary. He protested against the principle that salaries should be proportioned to the facility of getting the situations filled; that because persons could be found to take office for less than others received, therefore salaries were to be reduced. We might get plenty to do our duties (said Mr. W.) for six, five, or four dollars per day—ay, for nothing at all: but was that an argument in favor of reduction? The per diem which he received he thought only a fair compensation for the duties, and he was free to acknowledge that he would not take the station for less; but no doubt there were many that would. If the whole of the United States was searched, there could not be found a man more thoroughly acquainted with the duties of his office than the one selected to commence the experiment of economy on, and he could not think of recording his vote for concurring in the amendment of the House without bearing testimony to the merit of that individual. But the citizens of the State he had the honor in part to represent, was largely interested in pensions, received for meritorious services in the Revolution, and would suffer much inconvenience by an interruption of its operations, and he was compelled, by these circumstances, to vote in favor of concurring in the amendment.

Mr. PRENTISS expressed his determination to concur in the amendment. He made no objections to individuals; but would concur in any amendment where salaries were to be reduced, until they were graduated by the scale of State officers.

Mr. WHITE said, if the question were as to an original office, he would not hesitate in concurring with the House; but he thought there were principles involved, which should not be sacrificed to any question of mere convenience. It would be a dangerous precedent for future legislation if we were to commit an official impropriety on a mere question of convenience. From his knowledge of the rules of the other House, he had confidence enough to send it back, and then if that body would not recede, why then it would be time to yield to the convenience of the measure. Mr. W. said he was in favor of equal salaries with the States; but, in a city like this, it would be offering a premium on celibacy, as a man of family could not live on less than $3,000. He was for non-concurring, and letting the responsibility rest on those upon whom it ought to fall.

Mr. PRESTON hoped the Senate would not concur in the amendment. He thought the advantage to be gained by such a step would more than counterbalance all the inconvenience. It was not to be supposed that more than 48 hours, at farthest, would intervene between that time and perfecting the bill. There was another matter that he desired should be reached, and which he believed it was also the wish of some members of the other body should be changed. By this bill the Navy Pension Fund was transferred to this office—most improperly, as he thought; and sending it back would give an opportunity of amending it in that particular.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said the Senator from South Carolina had tired too soon in his race of retrenchment and reform. In a little discussion, the other day, upon the reduction of a salary, he had understood the Senator to pledge himself to go as far as he (Mr. C.) would in that praiseworthy object. But it appeared that, in the very next step, the Senator was disposed to desert him. He wanted to see something like consistency preserved.

Mr. PRESTON said there was a pruriency in the imagination of the gentleman in fixing upon him the charge of inconsistency. What were the facts of the case? When he had advocated a concurrence with the amendment of the House the other day, there was not a reduction, but the creation of a new office—a mere mechanical office, not requiring intellectual research. This was a very different matter. He was for giving a fair compensation for mechanical labor, and a liberal compensation for intellectual labor. This would be the best economy. He was willing that there should be a general retrenchment of the expenditures of the Government; but not in striking at the salaries of meritorious men. He was not disposed to go into a field, thrashing on this side and on that, striking at the peace and comfort of families. If the Senator desired really to retrench the expenses, he could find sufficient in the numerous light-houses and harbors; and in that case he would cheerfully go with him. He made these remarks with a view to correct any impressions that might have been made by his observations of the other day. He did not go for putting the offices up to the lowest bidders. He was for giving such salaries as would comport with liberal justice, and the dignity of the Government.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said the Senator from South Carolina had certainly beaten a retreat from the ground occupied by him the other day. It was within the recollection of Senators that, when a similar question was before them the other day, that gentleman had taken very broad ground in his ideas of retrenchment. He had even suggested a reduction of the per diem of Senators. Now, when we were making new appointments, and fixing new compensations, he did expect the Senator from South Carolina would have gone with him in the contemplated reform. He found it very easy for some gentlemen to talk of retrenchment and reform, but it was very difficult to get a case which they considered a proper one to act on. And even those who boasted most loudly of their economy, were apt to falter when brought to a vote.

Mr. PRESTON said, if, by economy, the gentleman means to take $500 out of the pocket of a meritorious officer, he would not do it; or to take $100,000 out of the Treasury to make a road in Alabama, he would not go with him in either case. When he found a valuable public servant, he could not find it in his nature to cut him down the meagre pittance of $500. His wish was to pay all the public officers well; he thought the system of reduced salaries the worst species of extravagance.

Mr. CRITTENDEN did not know the officer alluded to personally; but he believed, from all he could understand, that his official capacity justified all that had been said. The business was one certainly of no ordinary trust. Mr. C. wished, when the matter of retrenchment was gone into, that it should be general, not partial, in its bearing. He should vote against the amendment of the House.

Mr. PIERCE said he reported the bill containing the clause which had been objected to by the Senator from South Carolina, (the transfer of the Navy Pension Fund to the office of the Commissioner,) but it had been done after consultation with the Commissioner of Pensions, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, and the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and had received their full concurrence.

The question was then taken on concurring with the amendment of the House, and carried—yeas 30, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Bates, Calhoun, Crittenden, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Pierce, Porter, Preston, Spence, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—13.

So the amendment was concurred in, and the bill finally passed.

THE SPECIAL ORDER.

The report of the Select Committee on the assumption of State debts was then taken up, and Mr. GRUNDY addressed the Senate at length, and with great ability, in reply to the various objections against the report. Without concluding, Mr. G. gave way for a motion to go into Executive session.

After which, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, March 4, 1840.

As soon as the journal had been read,

Mr. PETRIKIN asked leave to offer the following resolution, which was read for information:

Resolved, That the Committee of Accounts be instructed to report to this House all the facts in relation to the furnishing this House with stationery by the CLERK, including the difference of price paid for the stationery furnished to the Senate and that furnished this House; and, further, that they report all the facts relative to contracts made by the CLERK with S. D. Langtree for lithographing certain maps authorized by the last Congress to be published, and the price paid for the copperplate engraving of the same maps published by order of the Senate; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers in order to enable them to comply with the foregoing instructions.

Objection being made, Mr. PETRIKIN moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to offer it. And his motion prevailing, the resolution was received.

Mr. CHARLES JOHNSTON moved to amend by striking out all after the word resolved and inserting the resolutions offered by him last week, as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that the Clerk of this House, without the authority of law, or sanction of the House of Representatives, did, on the 25th day of March, and 23d day of December last, make two several contract, in writing, with one S. D. Langtree, and by which contracts said Langtree agreed to furnish all the stationery, and execute all the lithographing and copper-plate engraving which should be required for the Twenty-sixth Congress, as may more fully appear by referring to said contracts respectively:

And whereas it is alleged that, in pursuance of said contract or contracts, said Langtree (who is neither stationer, lithographer, nor engraver) has furnished and delivered to said CLERK, for the use of this House, a large quantity of stationery, and has presented his bill for the same, amounting to $19,521 64; and that said stationery (particularly the paper) is of an inferior quality, and is charged at price equal to 20 per cent. above the usual prices of stationery of the best quality, and by which difference of price and quality this Government (if said bill is allowed) would sustain a loss of more than $4,000 for the stationery already delivered; and, that, if said contracts should be sanctioned by this House, and continued in force during the Twenty-sixth Congress, the Government would be subjected to the sacrifice of more than $15,000, arising from the employment of another person to perform the duties which the CLERK himself is required to perform by the resolution of the House passed March 3, 1827, and under which it has been the uniform practice of the Clerks of this House to furnish the stationery, until the making of the contracts above referred to: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House has no power or authority to make any prospective contract which will require an application of moneys out of the contingent fund of this House, or an appropriation by Congress to satisfy the same, without the express authority of this House, and that the contracts referred to in the foregoing preamble are wholly inoperative and void.

Resolved, nevertheless, That if the said Langtree shall (in writing) elect to give up and cancel the said two contracts, then, and in that event, the Committee on Accounts are hereby authorized to audit and allow to him his bill for stationery already delivered, and services performed, under said contracts, subject to such deductions as ought to be made therefrom on occount of the quality and the prices charged therefor. And that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. J. then made some remarks on the principal points of his amendment, but more especially on the power of the Clerk to make contracts. The two contracts made with Mr. Langtree in March and December last were read at the Clerk's table, after which Mr. J. desired to know on what day of December it was on which the Clerk was re-elected.

The SPEAKER said it was the 21st day of that month.

Mr. JOHNSTON then contended that the contracts referred to were made by Mr. GARLAND, the Clerk, without any official authority, and for which the House was not bound. He disclaimed imputing to the Clerk any moral turpitude in his conduct, but considered the contracts as entirely unauthorized, as they were made after his official existence had expired. Mr. J. then went on to suppose a number of cases in which the House might be imposed upon by permitting the Clerk to employ a sub-agent for the procuring of stationery, instead of going directly to the paper makers himself. Among other matters, he referred to the single article of sealing wax. He supposed that a sub agent employed by the CLERK, might furnish to the House the best Victoria wax, done up in splendid paper boxes, which cost two cents each, at $2 50 per box, not containing quite a pound, when the very same kind of wax, in similar boxes, could be purchased for $1 25 per pound. He also supposed a case where the sub-agent might go to Mr. Hudson, the celebrated paper maker, and purchase letter paper at $5 25 per ream, paying for it by a draft on the United States Bank, whose notes were ten per cent. below par. Also, that the same paper was afterwards brought to this city, and sold to Government at $6 70 per ream. He further supposed that a sub-agent might go to New York city and purchase paper of an inferior quality, for which he might charge the House $6 per ream, when the Secretary of the Senate was buying the same kind of paper for $3 50 per ream, with a reduction of 5 per cent. for cash.

Mr. J. then adverted to the fact of the CLERK contracting with Mr. Langtree for lithography. He asked why the CLERK went to Mr. L. who was not a lithographer, but who must necessarily go to an artist to get the work done. He thought Mr. Langtree exhibited more skill in making a contract, than in the arts, and demanded why the House should be burdened with the commission necessarily charged indirectly by a sub-agent, for performing a duty belonging to the CLERK?

Mr. DROMGOOLE respectfully asked the chairman of the Committee of Elections whether he was not ready to report on the New Jersey case.

Mr. CAMPBELL, the chairman, replied in the affirmative. After some debate on a point of order, arising from a misapprehension on the part of Mr. CHARLES JOHNSTON,

Mr. DROMGOOLE said that, from the answer just given by the chairman of the Committee of Elections, he should make but a few brief remarks on the question before the House. He then referred to the 96th rule, which makes it the duty of the Committee on Accounts to investigate all matters of expenditure. He would not submit the question as to whether that committee had the subject already under consideration, because the rule in question made it their imperative duty so to do. But he would ask what was the course pursued by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] a member of the committee. He was actually shrinking from an investigation by the Committee. Was it not discourteous to the committee for the gentleman to come here without authority from the committee. [Mr. D. here explained that he used the term "discourteous" in a parliamentary sense.] He appealed to the House whether it was sufficiently acquainted with the law and the fact, so as to determine at once, without investigation, that the whole contract made by the CLERK was contrary to law. He was surprised at the course of the gentleman from New York, in proposing that the House should declare the whole contract void and fraudulent, without proper investigation. It reminded him of the conduct of one of the infernal judges, whose practice it was to decide first, and hear testimony afterwards. Mr. D. asked what would be thought of a judge of our courts who should, at the request of an advocate decide, without investigation, a case which properly belonged to the jury. He had no disposition to screen either the CLERK or Mr. Langtree, as his vote should show; but he wished the subject to have a fair investigation before the proper committee, and did not wish to vote blindfolded.

Mr. D. concluded by moving the previous question.

Mr. LAWRENCE and Mr. JOHNSON of Va. both appealed to him to withdraw his motion, but he refused to do so.

Mr. PETRIKIN modified his resolution (so as to make it read as given above.)

The question on the second to the previous question was then taken by tellers—Messrs. RIVES and DAVIES of Pennsylvania acting as tellers—and decided in the affirmative—ayes 97, noes 73.

The question "Shall the main question be now put?" coming up,

Mr. JOHNSTON of New York called for the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, the question was taken and decided in the affirmative—yeas 110, nays 79.

The main question was then taken, and decided unanimously in the affirmative—yeas 180, nays none.

Mr. JONES of Virginia submitted a resolution that the House resolve itself in a Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill authorizing the issuing of Treasury notes, and that the said bill shall have precedence over all other business until disposed of.

Objection being made by several gentlemen to the reception of the resolution,

Mr. JONES moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer it.

Mr. CAMPBELL expressed a wish that the resolution might be laid on the table in order that he might have an opportunity of submitting a report from the Committee of Elections, on the New Jersey case.

Mr. BELL inquired whether the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means wished to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the Sub-Treasury bill. If so, he would vote for the motion.

Mr. JONES of Virginia replied that he was as anxious as any gentleman to get up that bill; and the only reason why it had not been taken up was, that it had not been reached in the regular course of business.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and lost (there not being a vote of two-thirds)—yeas 116, nays 69, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Barnard, Beatty, Beirne, Biddle, Blackwell, Boyd, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Clifford, Coles, Conner, Mark A. Cooper, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Wagner, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Sherrod Williams—69.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked leave to make a report from the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER said that reports were not in order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then, sir, I offer the report as a question of privilege, under the directions of the House, which were that the committee should report forthwith.

The SPEAKER was of opinion that it was not a question of privilege. The introduction of the word forthwith into the order of the House could not make the report a special order, without a vote of two-thirds.

Mr. CAMPBELL then moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to present the report.

Mr. CROSS desired, before he voted on the question, respectfully to ask of the chairman of the committee if he was prepared to report every thing that the committee directed him to report. Mr. C. was called to order by several; when

The SPEAKER said that debate was not in order on a motion to suspend the rules.

The question was then taken on suspending the rules, and decided in the negative, yeas 104, nays 78, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Biddle, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, W. O. Butler, J. Wagner, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Sherrod Williams—78.

Mr. VANDERPOEL asked leave of the House to introduce a series of resolutions referring the various subjects in the President's message to the appropriate committees.

Objections being made by several members,

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. EVANS of Maine said that the motion of the gentleman was irregular. The usual course was to refer the whole message to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where it was discussed before referring the several parts of it to the appropriate committees. If the gentleman would modify his motion so as to refer the message to the Committee of the Whole House he would vote for it.

Mr. VANDERPOEL. If the message gets into Committee of the Whole we should never get it out again.

The resolutions were then read for the information of the House.

Mr. ADAMS desired to know if it was the gentleman's object, after the expiration of two months of the session, to send all the different subjects to the committees without previously discussing them in Committee of the Whole. If so, the gentleman intended to effect an entire revolution in the practice of the House.

Mr. VANDERPOEL would respond to the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The friends of the Administration were not justly chargeable with a delay in the reference of the message.

[Here Mr. V. was interrupted with repeated calls to order.]

The CHAIR stated that the debate was not in order.

Mr. VANDERPOEL then said he would make a direct answer to the gentleman's inquiry. It was not his intention that the message should go to the Committee of the Whole.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative—there not being a vote of two-thirds—yeas 104, nays 85.

Mr. LAWRENCE moved to refer the message of the President to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CLIFFORD moved to amend the motion by excepting from it the subject of the Northeastern boundary, and referring it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. LAWRENCE said that could be done by general consent. There would be no objection, he presumed, to referring the Northeastern boundary question to the Committee on Foreign Affairs as soon as the message got into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLIFFORD then observed that, with that understanding, he had no objection to the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was then taken on Mr. LAWRENCE'S motion, and it was carried without a division.

Mr. DROMGOOLE inquired if it was then in order to move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of considering the President's message.

The SPEAKER said the motion would not then be in order.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. Then, sir, I give notice that I shall move every day, at one o'clock, to go into Committee of the Whole, until the motion shall prevail.

It being now a quarter past 5 o'clock,

The SPEAKER proceeded to call the committees for reports, (pursuant to the rule which sets apart one hour for the same,) commencing with the Committee on Public Lands, where the call had last been suspended.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported

A bill to annex a certain tract of land to the Coosa land district, in the State of Alabama, and for other purposes;

A bill for the relief of Suttler Stephens; and

A bill establishing an additional land district in the State of Alabama; which were severally referred to the Commitee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi, from the same committee, reported

A bill for the removal of the land office from Chocchuma, Mississippi, to Granada, in said State; and which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. T. also made an unfavorable report on the petition of Harrison R. Blanch, and asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky, from the same committee, reported unfavorably on the petition of John Cole; which report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed; also,

A bill for the relief of the heirs of William Williams, deceased; and

A bill to allow further time to the trustee of Centre College to dispose of the lands heretofore granted for the Deaf and Dumb Asylum in the State of Kentucky; which were read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JAMES GARLAND, from the same committee, reported

A bill for the relief of the representatives of John Gumbale;

A bill for the relief of Mary Tucker;

which were read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a resolution to appropriate $3000 for a temporary ferry between the broken parts of the Potomac bridge; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BEIRNE, from the same committee, reported a bill to incorporate the Washington City Benevolent Society.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, from the same committee, reported a resolution, that the Committee for the District of Columbia be authorized to employ a Clerk, and allow him $4 per day; which resolution was rejected—yeas 62, nays 86.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill for changing the time of holding the term of the District Court of Alabama; which was agreed to.

Mr. S. also reported

A bill for the relief of the heirs and representatives of Thomas Atkinson, deceased;

A bill to enable the United States to discharge liens and incumbrances upon certain real estates;

A bill confirming to the State of Indiana certain lands in that State; and which were severally referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

A bill for the relief of John H. Sheppard;

Mr. HOFFMAN, from the same committee, reported

A bill for the relief of certain debtors of the United States, and to repeal certain acts relating to such debtors; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

The call for reports had proceeded only so far as the Committee on the Judiciary, when the hour having elapsed,

Mr. R. GARLAND called for the orders of the day.

Pending which motion, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, March 5, 1840.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. BENTON presented a petition from the city of New York, signed by Wm. S. Parrott and one hundred and fifty others, praying for the establishment of a uniform bankrupt law in the United States.

Mr. BENTON said that the petitioners in sending their petition to him, a Senator from another State, while their own State was represented on this floor, clearly expected from him something more than its mere presentation; they evidently expected him to say something on the subject-matter of the petition, and probably of his own sentiments in relation to it. In this he had no objection to gratify them. He had been long enough in the Senate, and attentive enough to questions of public interest, to have formed an opinion in relation to the bankrupt question; and, having formed it, he had no objection to express it on any proper occasion.

Assuming the present to be a proper occasion, he would go on to say that, twice since he had been a member of the Senate, the subject of a general bankrupt law had been pressed upon Congress—once in the House of Representatives near twenty years ago, and again in the Senate about a dozen years ago. With the first of these movements he had nothing to do, the bill which originated in the House of Representatives having been rejected in that body, without coming to the Senate; in the second movement he acted a decided part, and was one of twelve who then voted to include banks in the general law against bankrupts. In the final question he voted against the bill; and should so vote again in relation to a general bankrupt law which should not be applicable to corporations as well as to persons.

Mr. B went on to say that there was a general movement going on at this time, in the principal cities, in favor of a national bankrupt law; and petitions were daily arriving in the Senate in favor of the object. All this was very natural after the wrecks which had been made in the commercial world by the expansions, contractions, and explosions of the paper system within the last seven years. It was all very natural; but to give a chance of success to the movement, it must emerge from the narrow boundaries of a class, and spread out upon a broad basis, and assume a general and national form. A bankrupt bill for merchants and traders only, cannot be expected to pass: it has been tried often and has failed. To fail again would be the inevitable fate of such a movement, and that by a larger vote than heretofore; for all the reasons for including other classes have now become stronger than ever. Persons who are not merchants or traders, have been carried away by the spirit of the times, and have been involved in debts from which they see no means of extrication. These have a right to the relief of a bankrupt law, as well as those regularly engaged in trade; at the same time they should not be subject to the compulsory application of the law. With them the application of the law should be voluntary and optional: it should only be applied to them on their own petition; while with those regularly engaged in trade, and particularly bound to know the laws of trade, and to obey these laws, the application of the law should be compulsory, and should take effect upon the petition of a given proportion of the creditors. This extension of the principle of the act would make it universal in its application to persons; its extension to corporations would be all that would be wanting to make it entirely national, and fitly applicable to every case in which the relation of debtor and creditor existed. Now the question is, why should not these corporations be subject to the same law for bankrupts to which natural persons are subject? and the answer is, that they ought to be so subject—that their number—their wealth—their privileges—their duties—their conduct—their artificial structure—their relation to the community, and the relation of the community to them; their power over the States in forcing a violation of contracts, and the tender of paper money, and the duty of Congress to prevent the States from impairing contracts, or making any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts; all these circumstances and considerations point out corporations, not merely as the fit and proper, but as the pre-eminently fit and proper subjects for the application of a bankrupt law.

Their number is excessive, and the number of persons belonging to each corporation is great. Take a single branch of these corporations—the banks—and see the number of persons interested in them, and see what a gap in a national law their exemption from the bankrupt act would make. Their number is computed at near one thousand; at an average of forty or fifty stockholders to each, a mass of forty or fifty thousand men would be given; all to be exempt from the operation of a national law. Yet this is only the beginning—it is the commencement only of the exempted classes. The banks, numerous as they are, are nothing but a unit in the vast sum of the corporations. The whole Union is filled with these artificial beings—bodies of men associated for trade or business—protected by acts of incorporation, and engaged in every conceivable pursuit of which the head or hand of man is capable. To say that there are ten thousand of these corporations in the Union, would be to make a guess in a case where certainty is unattainable, and where the guess would be as apt to be under as to be over the mark. At the small estimate of twenty or thirty members to each of these corporations, there would result a body of two or three hundred thousand men to be exempted from a law called uniform and national.

The wealth of these corporations is great; the property which they hold is enormous, and they constitute themselves debtors to the whole community. Associated wealth is now the order of the day; chartered incorporations possess an immense proportion of the wealth of the country. In subjecting the property, debts, and effects of an ordinary merchant or trader, to distribution under a bankrupt law, I have no idea of exempting from the same process the immense and almost boundless wealth held by chartered and associated companies.

The privileges of corporations are also great. They possess great and extraordinary privileges; and I have no idea of adding to the number of these privileges by exempting them from the operation of a law directed against other debtors. They have the benefit of all the laws against debtors; if a bankrupt bill is passed, they will have the benefit of that also against those who are in debt to them. They will be included in the list of creditors for a pro rata distribution of the debtor's effects. Then why exempt them from the effects of a law against themselves, the benefit of which they have against others? These corporations have privileges enough already, and far too many! It is not extension, but diminution of privileges, which they ought to look for. Many of them pay no taxes; the property of the stockholders is not liable for the debts of the institution; they sue their debtors, sell their property, and put their bodies in jail. They have the privilege of stamping bits of paper with figures and pictures, and forcing it upon the community for money; they have the privilege of usury; for they may lend, and that by law, three or more paper dollars for each silver one they possess. In addition to all this, they take the privilege of becoming bankrupt when they please. They practise bankruptcy when and how they please: they have given examples enough of that within these three years past: and is it to be tolerated, that these corporations, in addition to all their other vast privileges and exemptions from law, are also to have the privilege of being bankrupt, and afflicting the country with the evils of bankruptcy, without being themselves subject to the laws of bankruptcy?

The duties of these corporations make them peculiarly fit for the remedies of a bankrupt law. Their duties are to pay money, and to pay it punctually. They deal in money: they live by dealing in it: they get rich by dealing in it: and they get possession of the actual money of the country, by promising to pay it back again when wanted. They receive deposites, than which nothing can be more sacred, nor impose a higher obligation to return with fidelity. They exact a credit from the whole community, by their promise to pay on demand the amount of the notes they issue. It is their duty to pay these deposites and these notes, and to pay with fidelity and punctuality. It is their sacred duty to do so: and if they fail in that duty, they are far more fit and proper subjects for the operation of a bankrupt law than the ordinary merchant and trader.

The conduct of these corporations is another reason for subjecting them to the bankrupt law, and that conduct consists in refusing to pay when they can pay! Disability is one thing—disinclination is another. Not to be able to pay, may be unfortunate; not to be willing to pay, must be criminal; and this is the case with the greater part of the non-paying banks of the Union. They affirm their ability to pay: most of them deny that they were under any necessity to stop payment; and affirm that they only did so because others had set the example: some of them in fact are shipping millions of specie to Europe, while denying a shilling to their depositors and note holders at home: and many of them resist resumption by others as well as by themselves. This is the conduct of the non-paying banks; and it is evil conduct—bad conduct—misconduct—and eminently entitles them to the most rigorous treatment against bankrupts.

The artificial structure, and the trustee character of these corporations, is another argument in favor of subjecting them to the bankrupt process. They are artificial, not natural beings: they are trustees, not owners, of the property of the corporation. If the natural man, made by the hand of the Almighty, impressed with his image, and endowed with inherent and inalienable rights by his Creator—one of which is the right of acquiring property; if this natural man may have the property taken out of his hands which is his own, which he has gained by his industry, or received by inheritance from his ancestors, or accepted as a portion with his wife; if this natural man may thus be stripped of his own, and see it placed in the hands of assignees for distribution among his creditors, with what face can the artificial being, called a corporation, which has neither parent, wife, nor child, and whose managers are nothing but trustees, managing property which is is not their own—with what face can this artificial being, and its trustees, claim an exemption from a process to which the natural man, and his self-owned estate, is to be subject? In one case, the owner of the property is substituted by trustees; in the other case, it is only a new set of trustees substituting an old set. The assignees of a bankrupt's estate become the trustees of the property for the benefit of the creditors; and if the legal owner may be superseded and substituted by these legal trustees, why may not a bank directory (who are nothing but chartered trustees,) give place to other trustees appointed by the law? The result of their management, supposing the bank over which they preside to commit an act of bankruptcy; the result of their management is a proof that they are either unfortunate, or incapable, or unfaithful trustees; and in either event, it is consonant to justice to change them for others; and this is all that a bankrupt law would propose to do. It would turn over their trust to a new set of trustees, to make a settlement of the concern, and to pay off, as far as possible, the persons to whom they had become indebted, and to whom they were either unwilling or unable to make payment, or among whom they might exercise favoritism; paying some, and refusing others.

The relation of these corporations to the community, and the relation of the community to them, is another strong and peculiar reason for subjecting them to the strong arm, and to the equitable provisions, of a bankrupt law. Of all the objects upon the earth able to contract debts—of all the classes of debtors, natural or artificial—banks of circulation are the most fit and proper subjects for bankrupt laws. Every part of their structure, and the whole course of their action, mark them out for the application of the remedy which the bankrupt laws apply. They are too strong for individuals to contend with; and therefore should be placed in contention with a strong power. They are too strong for State power; and therefore should be placed in contention with the power of the United States; and happily, that power is vested in the United States by the Federal Constitution. As BANKS, Congress cannot exercise any direct legislation over these institutions; as BANKRUPTS, they fall under its jurisdiction. All that Congress has to do then is to exercise its constitutional power over bankrupts; and it will present an authority strong enough to contend with banks, and to keep them in subordination to the laws of the country. Their course of action, still more than their great power, renders them peculiarly fit for the bankrupt process. They act in secret, and they exact a general credit from the community. Nobody knows their means, yet every body must trust them. They send "their promises to pay" far and wide: they push them into every body's hands: they make them small that they may get into the hands of small dealers—into the hands of the laborer, the widow, the child, the ignorant, and the helpless. Suddenly the bank stops payment: it refuses to pay, while professing ability to pay: and all these holders of its "promises" are repulsed from its door, and without remedy. A few on the spot get a little; the strong, and the favored, may get their due; the mass become the victims. If it is a suspension, they sell at a discount; if a failure, they lose all. For each holder of a small note to sue upon it, is a troublesome and losing business. The only adequate remedy—the only remedy that promises justice to the community—is the bankrupt remedy of assignees to distribute the effects. This makes the real effects available. When a bank stops, it has little or no specie; but it has, or ought to have, a good mass of solvent debts. At present all these debts are unavailable to the community: they go to a few large and favored creditors; and those who are most in need—the holders of the small notes—get nothing. But a stronger view remains to be taken of these debts. The mass of them are generally due from the stockholders and directors of the bank; and these gentlemen do not make themselves pay. They do not sue themselves, and sell their own property, and put their own bodies in jail. They serve others so. They sue, sell out, and imprison others; but as to themselves, who are the main debtors, it is quite another affair. They take their time, and usually wait till the notes of the bank are heavily depreciated, and then square off with a few cents in the dollar. They pay their notes in bank with their notes out of bank, bought at a discount. Here, then, is a crying case for the bankrupt remedy. A commission of bankruptcy is the remedy for this evil. A change of the trustees—a substitution of assignees in the place of the directory—is the way to make this class of debtors pay up. A pro rata distribution is the way to do justice to all. Under the bankrupt remedy, every holder of a note, no matter how small in amount the note may be—no matter how far distant from the bank the holder may reside—on forwarding the note to the assignees, he will receive his rateable proportion of the bank's effects; and that without trouble, without expense, and without personal attention from himself.

Besides these great reasons for applying a bankrupt law to corporations, there are other great purposes to be accomplished, and some most sacred duties to be fulfilled, by the same means. Our Constitution contains three most vital prohibitions upon the States, of which the Federal Government is the guardian and the guarantee, and which are now publicly trodden under foot. No State shall emit bills of credit: no State shall make any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts: no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts. So says the Constitution! So says that sacred fundamental law which it is the duty of every citizen to protect, preserve, and defend. But a new power has sprung up among us, and has annulled all these prohibitions. That new power is the oligarchy of banks! This oligarchy has done what the States dare not do. It has filled the whole land with bills of credit; for all admit that a bank note not convertible at the will of the holder into specie, is a bill of credit. It has set aside the constitutional currency, and made paper money, and even depreciated paper, a forced tender in payment of every debt. It has violated its own contracts, and compelled all individuals, and the Federal Government, and the State Governments, to violate theirs; and has obtained from sovereign States an express sanction, or a silent acquiescence, in this double violation of sacred duties, and in this triple annulment of constitutional obligations. This is what the oligarchy of banks has done; this is what many of the banks are now doing; and the way to prevent these evils—the way to preserve, protect, and defend our Constitution in these vital particulars, and to do it without a collision with the States—is to exercise our constitutional power of applying a bankrupt law to bankrupt banks.

Mr. B. said there was nothing new in applying a bankrupt law to banks. It was done in England, where NINETY-TWO banks were subjected to this process in the years 1814, '15, and '16; and many others before and since. The remedy was originally directed against bankers, and bankers alone. We got the idea of this law from the English; they got it from the Italians of the middle ages; and these Italians obtained it from the civil law of the Romans. In all these countries—in ancient Rome, in modern Italy, in England—the bankrupt law applied to corporations, and especially to banks and bankers; and it is only in the United States that these institutions have become too powerful to be subject to the laws which apply to them in other countries. In England alone, there is a limitation of the application; the Bank of England, the East India Company, and some others, being exempt.

In presenting the petition sent to him from the city of New York, Mr. B. thought it proper to say thus much of his opinions in relation to the subject of the petition. It might be of some service to those engaged in calling the attention of Congress to the passage of a general law, to know that, by including banks, they may gain some accession—his accession at least—to their cause; and it might be some consolation to the bank-ridden people of this country to know, that they can regulate these institutions, and make them subordinate to the laws of the country, whenever they choose to apply a bankrupt law to them.

Mr. B. concluded with hailing, as one of the auspicious signs of the times—as showing the progress of the age towards correct principles—the enthusiasm with which was received, a few days ago, in a great city, and in a large meeting of mixed politicians, the sentiment of including corporations in the provisions of a general bankrupt law. He alluded to the great meeting lately held in the city of New York, presided over by the Mayor, (Mr. Varian,) and attended by the business community, without distinction of parties. In that meeting, Mr. Butler, the late Attorney General of the United States, being called on for his opinion, gave it in favor of including corporations in the same act which should apply to persons; and the sentiment was received with enthusiasm—with vehement applause.

Mr. B. said this was cheering—it was encouragement to go on. Twelve years ago, when himself and a few Senators voted in favor of including banks in the bill then depending, their vote found little or no response in the public bosom. Three years ago when he made a speech to the same point, he received nothing but solitary responses, coming from individuals, in different parts of the Union. Now the sentiment finds its response in the bosom of the largest meeting of business men in the first city of the New World; and from this great centre it must go forth to find responses from every quarter of the Union.

Mr. B. then presented the petition, which received the usual reference to the Judiciary Committee.

The CHAIR presented a message from the President of the United States, in reply to a resolution of the Senate of the 17th of February, in relation to the necessity of further legislation in regard to the papers of vessels bound on foreign voyages; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a resolution of the House of Representatives of the Territory of Florida, to procure the passage of a law to authorize the sale of certain lots in the town of St. Marks, in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. HENDERSON presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, in favor of the passage of the Independent Treasury bill, and of the bill to graduate the price of the public lands to actual settlers, and approving the policy of the past and present Administrations; which were read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a petition from citizens of New York, praying for the enactment of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. W. also presented a memorial from citizens of Essex county, New York, praying a reduction of the rates of postage.

Mr. TAPPAN presented a letter from William D. Jones, asking compensation for extra services performed while consul at Mexico; which, with a resolution of inquiry on the subject, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of John Compton; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WALL, from the Joint Committee on the Library, made a report on the subject of the Madison Papers, by which it appears that they have been printed, and are ready for delivery: the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of William McMahon, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee of the Judiciary, to which was referred the memorial of Samuel Lord, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred the memorial of citizens of Ohio, for a road from the valley of the Ohio to the valley of the Columbia river, made an adverse report thereon.

On motion of Mr. TALLMADGE,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and hereby is, authorized to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate, any excess of postage charged upon packages directed to members of the Senate upon public business.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLAS,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire if any and what further legislation may be necessary to insure the prompt and punctual transportation of the mail between Mobile and New Orleans.

On motion of Mr. WHITE,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate what amount of money has accrued, being the 5 per cent of the nett proceeds of the lands lying within the State of Alabama, reserved for the purposes specified in 6th section of the act of Congress, 2d March, 1819, entitled an act to enable the people of Alabama Territory to form a Constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and what portion of the 3 per cent. (parcel of said 5 per cent. fund) authorized by the said act to be expended under the direction of the Legislature of Alabama, has been paid to the State of Alabama.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill to extend for a longer time the several acts now in force for the relief of insolvent debtors of the United States; and were severally read a third time, and passed.

The bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make an arrangement or compromise with any of the sureties on bonds given to the United States by Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the customs for the port of New York;

THE SPECIAL ORDER.

The report of the Select Committee on the assumption of State debts, was then taken up, and Mr. GRUNDY concluded his remarks on the subject.

After some further remarks from Mr. GRUNDY and Mr. TALLMADGE,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, March 5, 1840.

Mr. CHINN asked leave to offer a resolution, calling upon the Postmaster General for information relating to the irregularities of the mail between New York and New Orleans.

Objection having been made by Mr. CRAIG,

Mr. CHINN said the question was one of importance to the whole country; and he moved a suspension of the rule.

Which motion having been put, the House refused to suspend the rule.

Mr JONES of Virginia asked permission to offer a resolution that the House shall, on to-morrow, go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, until one o'clock, for the purpose of considering the bill authorizing the issue of five millions of Treasury notes, and that the bill be considered every morning at the same hour, until finally disposed of.

Mr. GRAVES objected. He thought the better way would be to go on with the regular business on the SPEAKER'S table, by which course the Sub-Treasury bill might probably be reached to-day, and referred.

Mr. JONES assured the gentleman from Kentucky that the Sub-Treasury bill would be taken up and referred at the earliest practicable moment. He, himself, would shortly ask its reference to the Committee of Ways and Means, after which, although he would give no pledge as to the time when it would be reported, yet the gentleman might depend that it would be acted upon with the least possible delay. He repeated that on his part no effort should be wanting to bring it before the House at the earliest practicable moment.

Mr. J. then moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer the resolution; which motion was negatived, yeas 103, nays 73, as follows, [not two-thirds]

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Biddle, Boyd, Brewster, A. V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Clifford, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, Craig, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Davis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, James Garland, Gerry, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Holmes, Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, J. W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leet, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Maliory, Marchand, Miller, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Parish, Parmenter, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rhett, Rives, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweeny, Taylor, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—103.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Bell, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, Carter, Chittenden, Clark, Cushing, Edward Davies, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dillett, Edwards, Evans, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Hall, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, Lincoln, Mason, Mitchell, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Ogle, Osborne, Pope, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Ridgway, Russell, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Taliaferro, W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Sherrod Williams—73.

The standing committees were then called on for reports.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that the House do now proceed to the orders of the day.

Mr. CAMPBELL hoped before the House proceeded to the orders of the day, that he might be permitted to make the report from the Committee of Elections, on the New Jersey case.

In answer to a question as to whether the report could not be received at any time,

The SPEAKER responded that the report could only be received when reports should be in order from the Committee of Elections.

Mr. CAMPBELL then moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to make the report.

Several members suggested to Mr. C. that the better course would be to allow the question first to be taken on the motion of Mr. BRIGGS, as in case the House should refuse to proceed to the orders of the day, the call for reports would be continued, so that the report could be made in order.

Mr. CAMPBELL then withdrew his motion to suspend the rules.

The question was then taken on the motion to take up the orders of the day, and it was negatived—yeas 83, nays 104.

Mr. SAMUELS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported

A bill for the relief of Sarah B. Stith and her children; which was twice read and committed

Also made an unfavorable report on the petition of the representatives of Peyton Randolph, deceased; which was laid on the table.

Mr. STORRS, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Benjamin Fry; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. TURNEY, from the same committee, reported

A bill for the relief of Joseph Wallis, and the heirs and legal representatives of Robert Leckie and Jeremiah D. Hayden, deceased;

A bill to refund a fine imposed on the late Matthew Lyon, under the sedition law, to his heirs and legal representatives; which were read twice, and committed.

Mr. CRARY, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of William Saunders and William R. Porter, sureties of William Estis; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, from the committee to which was referred the bill to provide for the disposal and management of the fund bequeathed by James Smithson to the United States for the establishment of an institution for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men, reported an amendatory bill, accomdanied by a report, which were committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, from the Committee on the Library, reported a joint resolution for the disposition of certain documents now deposited in the Library of Congress; which was read.

In the course of the despatch of the above business from the committees, one question arose on discharging the Committee on Indian Affairs from the consideration of certain papers, and referring them to the Committee of Claims, which was debated at considerable length, and finally decided by yeas and nays—yeas 77, nays 56.

Mr. BELL having introduced a resolution granting to the Committee on Indian Affairs power to send for persons and papers, with a view to investigate certain alleged frauds in a treaty made with the Caddo Indians—

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana said he hoped the resolution reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs would be adopted, and that the committee would proceed with as much diligence as possible to the examination of the charges contained in the petition of Samuel Norris, alleging fraud and misconduct against Jehiel Brooks, the commissioner who negotiated the treaty with the Caddo Indians of 1835, by which Norris alleges he has been injured, and the Government defrauded out of a valuable tract of land.

Mr. G. said, from the delay that had occurred, and from the representations which would probably be made by Brooks, it might appear he had been remiss in the discharge of his duty. To counteract any impression of the kind that might be made on any portion of his constituents, he thought it necessary to recall the attention of the House to what had taken place, and the facts as they appeared on the journal, or were known to the members.

Mr. G. said he had had the memorial of Mr. Norris in his possession some time before he had an opportunity of presenting it, in consequence of the peculiar condition of the House. He had mentioned some of the facts in relation to this transaction to a person in this city, who is interested in the land, and told him that, as soon as practicable, it was his (Mr. G's) intention to present the matter to the consideration of the House of Representatives. This conversation, which was a general character, he believed, had been communicated to Brooks, but in what language he did not know.

Mr. G. said, that on the 6th of February, as would appear by the journal, he had presented the petition of Mr. Norris, with the evidence in support of it. It was the first day, under the rules, that he could present that petition, or any other. When he presented it, he called the attention of the House, and particularly that of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. BELL] to its contents, which he stated very fully, and requested his immediate attention to it. Some five or six days after, (Mr. G said,) he had received a letter from Jehiel Brooks, stating that he had been waiting for some time to see his (Mr. G's) "indictment" against him. The tone and evident object of the letter was, doubtless, to get up an issue different from the one made by Mr. Norris, and with another person—for what purpose it was not difficult to divine.

Mr. G. said, as it was not his intention to permit any change of the issue presented, or to have the investigation smothered by a personal controversy with Mr. Brooks, he had not answered the letter, but immediately informed a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs of it, and desired that an immediate investigation take place, and that Brooks be notified of it. Some days after, he received another letter from Brooks, reiterating his request, in impertinent language, which Mr. G. said he did not choose to notice, but called on the chairman of the committee, and requested the memorial of Norris might be taken up without delay, and Brooks notified, which was promised. Mr. G. said a delay had occurred in the committee, from the mass of business before it, and the fact that the memorial was not laid before it by the officers of the House for some week or ten days after it was presented, in consequence of the mass of petitions presented on the 5th and 6th February, all of which had to be entered on the journal, docketed, and distributed.

Mr. G. said that, on the 24th of February, with a view of facilitating the investigations of the Committee on Indian Affairs, it would appear from the journal that he had offered a resolution calling on the Secretary of War for all the documents, papers, and information in the possession of the Department in relation to the negotiation and execution of the Caddo treaty, and particularly in relation to the reservations of land in it. The resolution is very comprehensive, and covers the whole ground. It is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the amount agreed to be paid to the Caddo Indians by the treaty made with them on July 1, 1835, at what times and dates the said sums were paid, to whom paid, by whom paid, and whether the Indians have received said sums; if so, whether in money or merchandise; and if the latter, what was its real value. Also, that he communicate all the correspondence in the Department relating to the payment of said sums, together with all the information in his possession connected with the subject. And the said Secretary is also directed to communicate, in a separate report, all the documents on file in relation to the negotiation of said treaty with the Caddo Indians, and the reservation therein made, the instructions to the commissioners who negotiated the same, and all correspondence with him or other persons in relation to said treaty, or the reservations therein; the rights of the Indians to the land which was occupied by them; what right or claim the persons in whose favor the reservations are made have or had to the same; and generally all documents or information in the possession of the Department relating to the rights or claims of the said Indians; the negotiation and execution of the treaty, the rights of individuals who have been affected by it; the objects of the Government in making said treaty, and any other matter he may think proper connected with these objects."

Mr. G. said it would be recollected he had moved the immediate adoption of the resolution, stating at the time it was very desirable to obtain the information immediately, as it was necessary to prosecute the investigation into the alleged frauds in relation to the reservations in the Caddo treaty. An objection was made to the consideration of the resolution at that time by a gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CAVE JOHNSON,] and though Mr. G. had earnestly appealed to him to withdraw the objection, he had persisted, and the resolution necessarily laid over, under the rules of the House. On the morning of the 26th of February, this resolution was published in the National Intelligencer. On the afternoon of that day, Mr. Brooks, who had been so anxiously waiting for my indictment, set off to Louisiana, leaving a letter to be delivered to me after he was gone, impugning my motives, and threatening me with consequences which he had not the courage to stay here to execute. This letter (Mr. G. said) was delivered to him whilst in his seat, on the 27th of February, by one of the pages of the House. He immediately had inquiries made for Brooks, and found he had gone the day previous.

Mr. G. repeated his wish that the resolution should be adopted, and that the committee would take immediate measures to notify Brooks, and proceed to the investigation of the charges which he pretended to court, and of which he might have been informed any day after the 6th of February, by application to the Clerk of the House.

The resolution of Mr. BELL was adopted.

Another brisk discussion took place on a resolution moved by Mr. PICKENS, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, for the furnishing that committee with maps, those now in its committee room being antiquated, and in a great degree useless.

Mr. PETRIKIN desired that the committee should be restricted to such maps only as were now in the committee room of the library.

Mr. SUMTER warmly remonstrated against such an idea, and spoke of the vast importance of the matters submitted to the committee, and the necessity of its having all the lights which could be obtained.

Mr. ADAMS wished the committee confined to a definite number of maps; as the CLERK might otherwise make a contract with Mr. Langtree to furnish all the maps in Arrowsmith's collection, for aught he or the House knew.

Mr. PETRIKIN withdrew his amendment, and the resolution was recommitted.

Mr. CLIFFORD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, introduced a resolution that so much of the President's message as relates to the Northeastern boundary of the United States be referred to that committee.

Mr. GARLAND objected to this resolution as out of order, the whole message having already been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CLIFFORD then proposed, as his individual act, to modify the resolution.

Mr. GARLAND objected to this as equally out of order, because the gentleman could not, as a private individual, modify a resolution reported by a committee of the House.

Mr. PICKENS said the only design of resolution was to give the committee cognizance of the subject, which it might be important for it to have.

Mr. HUNT objected, but said that if the chairman of the committee would say it was now important, he would withdraw his objection.

Mr. CLIFFORD inquired whether his resolution, as modified, had been entertained by the CHAIR?

The CHAIR replying in the negative—

Mr. EVANS appealed; when after some conversation, Mr HUNT withdrew his objection, and Mr. EVANS his appeal, and the resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

The call of committees for reports having proceeded as far as the Committee on Revisal and Unfinished business—

Mr. HOFFMAN moved an adjournment, but it did not prevail.

The call of committees was now resumed, and when it had proceeded as far as the Committee on the Expenditures in the Department of War—

Mr. R. GARLAND, chairman of that committee, moved that the committee have power to send for persons and papers to enable it to inquire into the legality of these expenditures; together with an amendment proposing that the committee have power to employ a clerk at $4 per day during the sitting of the committee.

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the previous question on the resolution and amendment.

The call was seconded by the House, and the previous question was thereupon put and carried.

And the main question being first on the amendment, it was negatived—yeas 73, nays 99.

So the House refused to allow the committee a clerk

The question was then put on the adoption of the resolution, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 109, nays 53.

The CHAIR announced that reports from the Committee of Elections would be in order.

In compliance with the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives, on the 28th ultimo, instructing the Committee of Elections to "report forthwith which five of the ten individuals claiming seats from the State of New Jersey, received the greatest number of lawful votes from the whole State for Representatives in the Congress of the United States at the election of 1838, in said State, with all the evidence of that fact in their possession: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent or delay the action of said committee in taking testimony or deciding the said case upon the merits of the election." The committee submit the the following

REPORT:

While the commitee, from the commencement of its labors in this important case, have been actuated by the most anxious desire to do justice to the individual claimants, to the ancient and honorable State for whose service they are maintaining an animated contest, and to the whole American people, who have a deep and abiding interest in preserving the purity of elections; and while for securing so valuable a result, the committee had marked out a course somewhat different from that which seems now to be prescribed by the House, they cheerfully yield to its authority; and so far as they can ascertain its intention, they have no other inclination than to give it ample and speedy effect.

The committee, however, have encountered no inconsiderable difficulty in harmonizing all the terms of the resolution with that intention, which, from the circumstances of the case, as well as from the more prominent clauses of the resolution itself, they must understand to have governed the action of the House. To give every word in the resolution the full force of a literal interpetration, would be, perhaps, to raise such a conflict between the parts as to disable the whole. But instead of separating it into parts, the whole resolution should be so construed as to give expression to a distinct intention, which is capable of being ascertained and effectuated. As a portion of the House, the members of the committee are not ignorant of the importance that was attached to the insertion of the word "lawful," before the word "votes," in the resolution. Nor can they overlook the fact that connected with the proposition to insert, was the motion to strike out another word, utterly inconsistent with that broad and searching investigation which the insertion of the word "lawful" (without reference to other expressions in the resolution, or to the posture of the case it-elf) would seem to demand.

The House had referred to the committee the whole subject-matter of the controversy, and with it a mass of testimony having no application to any inquiry, short of the merits of the election. The committee had, as was well known to the House, entered upon this inquiry, and had adopted such measures for the procurement of testimony as would probably probe to the core all frauds and ile galities. In the prosecution of this investigation a delay had occurred, the deplorable effects of which were as manifest to the committee as to the House.

When the proposition to instruct was originally introduced as an amendment to the application with which the committee had come before the House, its intent was clear that a report should be immediately made of the names of those who had received the greatest number of votes at the last Congressional election in New Jersey. If any thing more was wanting to explain the meaning of this proposition, it is to be found in the proviso which was added, and which clearly indicated that the action which the House was moved to demand, did not contemplate an interference with the course adopted by the committee for the "taking of testimony, and deciding the case upon the merits of the election."

Under these circumstances, if the proposition to strike out the word "forthwith," and insert the word "lawful," had fully succeeded, there would still have remained that prominent clause of proviso; and it might well have been understood, that, notwithstanding the omission of the word "forthwith," the House desired an immediate report; and that, notwithstanding the insertion of the word "lawful," the House contemplated that the report should be independent of testimony, now under the process of being obtained, for the purpose of deciding the election upon its merits.

Upon what basis, then, could such a report be constructed? Manifestly not upon the partial, inconclusive, and incompetent testimony as to the legality of votes now in the possession of the committee. The House cannot have contemplated a report, involving an investigation of the ballot boxes, without allowing time or opportunity for that investigation to be thorough.

At the same time, the committee cannot entirely overlook the word "lawful," or strike that from the resolution which was inserted upon a contest so close as to require a casting vote for it's decision. Did this word stand disconnected with, or unqualified by, the various considerations already alluded to, no doubt could be entertained as to its effect. It would lead to a thorough and final purgation of the polls, and would delay a report to that period, to which it was well known to the House that the committee had postponed a decision upon the question of ultimate right.

There is but one other basis left, and that is the prima facie case upon the returns of the local officers of the several polls; and the nature of the controversy taken into consideration, it can scarcely be doubted that to this basis the resolution looked.

If this conclusion might reasonably have been reached, in the event of the complete and coeval success of the motions to strike out and insert, how much more easily is it attained when the resolution is found armed with the pungent word "forthwith," quickening the action of the committee, and declaring opposition to the long delay which had been found inseparable from a thorough investigation into the legality of the votes.

If, therefore, the word "lawful," surrounded as it is by every thing which negatives the idea of a mere adherence to the original course of the committee, can be made to harmonize with the context of the resolution, and the circumstances under which it was adopted, by every sound rule of construction, that end should rather be attained by limiting the meaning of that word, than by bending the reason and language of all the rest (if that were possible) to its strongest and amplest signification.

The committee are therefore of opinion that they correctly construe that word with the context, when they limit its signification to that prima facie lawfulness of votes which arises upon their reception at polls held in conformity with law; and in thus limiting its signification, they feel themselves sustained by the general language and spirit of the resolution, and by the situation of the case itself.

The committee are confirmed in this construction, and the course consequent thereon, by the consideration that any judgment looking beyond the face of the polls, which they might base upon the inconclusive testimony in their possession, would be unsatisfactory to the House, unjust to the parties, and calculated to produce erroneous conclusions in relation to a mass of facts which appear to be verified by the oaths of voters, but which, either because of the extra judicial administration of the oaths, or the want of due notice to the opposite parties, have been rejected as not sufficiently proven. It is proper, however, to state that, should all the votes proved to be illegal by competent testimony, be deducted from those who received the greatest number at the polls, which appear to have been held in conformity with law, the result would not affect the right of any candidate to a seat.

With this explanation, which they have considered due to the House and to themselves, the committee will now proceed to examine the allegations against the validity of certain township elections, as far as such an examination can be made upon the testimony in their possession.

Upon this branch of the case, the claimants holding the Governor's commissions, claim—

1st. That, apart from their not being received in time to be counted according to law, the votes of Millville should be set aside for the fraudulent and illegal conduct of the officers of election, in proclaiming their intention to receive the votes of aliens, and in receiving a large number of such knowingly, and in violation of the laws of the State.

Without inquiring into the effect of these charges, if they were substantiated by competent and satisfactory testimony, it is sufficient to state that they are unsupported by any testimony in the possession of the committee.

2d. They allege that, apart from all defects and irregularities in the return, the votes of South Amboy should be set aside, because one of the officers of election duly chosen, was unlawfully prevented from acting, and another substituted in his place, who acted and signed the list, &c.; and because the board, thus unlawfully constituted, received a large number of alien votes contrary to law.

In support of these allegations, numerous depositions have been produced, but without expressing an opinion, whether, if satisfactorily proved, they would constitute sufficient evidence of fraud to set aside the votes of this township; it is only necessary to state that the evidence was taken ex parte, without sufficient notice, and has been rejected by the committee as incompetent to be considered in this case.

3d. It is further claimed, that the poll held at Saddle River, in Bergen county, should be set aside: Because at least eight votes given for them were fraudulently abstracted from the ballot box, and as many for their opponents fraudulently substituted: Because in making out the list of votes in said township, at least eight votes less than were given for them were counted in their favor, and at least as many were counted for their opponents, more than they received: and because the list of votes in said township bears upon its face evidence of mistake or fraud.

In support of these charges, the depositions of numerous voters have been submitted; but, being taken ex parte, and without sufficient notice, they have been rejected by the committee, as incompetent testimony.

It is also claimed that the polls held at the townships of Newton, Harderton, and Vernon, in Sussex county, should be set aside, for reasons that will more fully appear by reference to the document marked A, accompanying this report. But there is no competent evidence before the committee in support of these allegations.

Having thus disposed, for the present, of the various objections to the validity of the elections held at the several townships claimed to be set aside, the committee will now proceed to ascertain "which five of the ten claimants received the greatest number of lawful votes" at the late Congressional election in New Jersey, according to the several returns purporting upon their face to be made by officers duly authorized to act.

The committee take as the basis of their calculation, the statement upon which the Governor and Privy Council of New Jersey made their decision, and which is found in the minutes of the proceedings of the Governor and Privy Council.

From this statement, it appears that the total of votes for each of the ten claimants was as follows:

For Philemon Dickerson - -	27,951
Peter D. Vroom - -	27,990

Daniel B. Ryall - -	27,939
William R. Cooper - -	27,954
Joseph Kille - - -	27,924
John B. Aycrigg - -	28,150
John B. P. Maxwell - -	28,239
William Halsted - -	28,192
Chas. C. Stratton - -	28,252
Thos. Jones Yorke - -	28,177
Philemon Dickinson - -	3
John B. Acrigg - - -	1

In this statement, as it appears to the satisfaction of the committee, and has not been denied or the contrary pretended, the votes received at the townships of Millville and South Amboy are not included.

The state of those polls is exhibited by the documents (marked C and D) accompanying this report, whereby it appears that the total of votes of the two townships, for each of the ten claimants, was as follows:

Philemon Dickerson - - -	502
Peter D. Vroom - - -	502
Daniel B. Ryall - - -	502
William R. Cooper - - -	501
Joseph Kille - - - -	502
J. B. Aycrigg - - - -	144
J. P. B. Maxwell - - -	144
William Halsted - - -	145
C. C. Stratton - - - -	144
T. J. Yorke - - - -	144

These votes being added respectively to those set forth in the documents marked B, already referred to as the basis of the Governor's commissions, the following results are exhibited, to wit:

For PHILEMON DICKERSON.

Votes counted by the Governor and Privy Council - - -	27,951
Votes of Millville and South Amboy	502
Total for Philemon Dickerson	28,453

For PETER D. VROOM.

Votes counted by the Governor and Privy Council - - -	27,990
Votes of Millville and South Amboy	502
Total for Peter D. Vroom	28,492

For DANIEL B. RYALL.

Votes counted by the Governor and Privy Council - - -	27,939
Votes of Millville and South Amboy	502
Total for D. B. Ryall - -	28,441

For WILLIAM R. COOPER.

Votes counted by the Governor and Privy Council - - -	27,954
Votes of Millville and South Amboy	501
Total for William R. Cooper	28,455

For JOSEPH KILLE.

Votes counted by the Governor and Privy Council - - -	27,924
Votes of Milville and South Amboy	502
Total for Joseph Kille -	28,426

For JOHN B. AYCRIGG.

Votes counted by the Governor and Privy Council - - -	28,150
Votes of Millville and South Amboy -	144
Total for John B. Aycrigg -	28,294

For JOHN P. B. MAXWELL.

Votes counted by the Governor and Privy Council - - -	28,239
Votes of Millville and South Amboy -	144
Total for John P. B. Maxwell -	28,383

For WILLIAM HALSTED.

Votes counted by the Governor and Privy Council - - -	28,192
Votes of Millville and South Amboy -	145
Total for William Halsted -	28,337

For CHARLES C. STRATTON.

Votes counted by the Governor and Privy Council - - -	28,252
Votes of Millville and South Amboy -	144
Total for Charles C. Stratton -	28,396

For THOMAS JONES YORKE.

Votes counted by the Governor and Privy Council - - -	28,177
Votes of Millville and South Amboy -	144
Total for Thomas Jones Yorke	28,321

It will be observed that the foregoing statement does not include as votes for Philemon Dickerson the three votes stated in the document marked B, as having been given to Philemon Dickinson, and which, if added to the votes for Philemon Dickerson, would make a total of 28,456.

The addition of the one vote stated in like manner as having been given for John B. Acrigg, to the votes for John B. Aycrigg, would make a total of 28,295.

Thus it appears that, prima facie, upon the evidence in the possession of the committee, Philemon Dickerson, Peter D. Vroom, Daniel B. Ryall, William R. Cooper, and Joseph Kille, are the "five of the ten individuals claiming seats from the State of New Jersey, [who] received the greatest number of lawful votes from the whole State for Representatives in the Congress of the United States, at the election of 1838, in said State."

The SPEAKER stated that he had yesterday received certain depositions in relation to the New Jersey case, which it was not in order for him then to present.

Mr. MEDILL called for the reading of the report of the committee.

The CLERK accordingly commenced reading the report, and had continued but for a short time, when

Mr. HOPKINS observed that it was evidently too late in the evening for the report to be read with any degree of profit, and, as the matter would come up the first thing in the morning, he suggested whether they had not better adjourn. Mr. H. then moved an adjournment.

Mr. CRAIG also suggested an adjournment for the same reasons, and moved the printing of the report; but, on cries of "No, no" from several, and the calling for the yeas and nays, the motion to adjourn was withdrawn.

The CLERK then continued the reading of the report for a short time, when he was again interrupted by

Mr. FILLMORE, who offered the following resolution:

Whereas the House did, by a motion adopted on the 28th day of February, 1840, among other things direct the Committee of Elections to report "forthwith" which five of the ten individuals claiming seats from the State of New Jersey received the greatest number of lawful votes from the whole State for Representatives in the Congress of the United States, at the election of 1838, in said State;" and whereas this House had previously referred evidence to that committee, tending to show that the poll at South Amboy, in said State, at said election, was not held according to law, and that the numerous votes given at said election were unlawful, because the persons voting had no legal right to vote, and the parties to said contest are now absent from this city, with the consent, and under the authority of said committee, taking testimony in said case, for the purpose of ascertaining who received the greatest number of lawful votes at said election in said State; and whereas certain depositions, alleged to have been taken by one of the parties to said contract, in pursuance of the directions of said committee, have been transmitted to the chairman of said committee in a sealed envelope, addressed to the SPEAKER of this House, tending to show, as is alleged, that the polls at South Amboy were not held according to law, and that unlawful votes were taken at said poll; and whereas said committee, in acting on said resolution of this House, refused to consider any portion of said evidence, but determined to report, and have reported, simply the number of "votes adjudged to have been given to the several claimants by the Governor and Privy Council of New Jersey, together with those returned by the election officers of the townships of Millville, in Cumberland county, and South Amboy, in Middlesex county, to the clerks of said counties respectively," without inquiring whether said votes were lawful or not; therefore,

Resolved, That said report be recommitted to said committee, with instructions to inquire and report to this House, with all convenient despatch, which five of the ten claimants to the vacant seats in this House from said State received the greatest number of lawful votes at the last Congressional election in said State.

Mr. DROMGOOLE rose at the same time with Mr FILLMORE, and handed up a resolution which he wished to offer; but the SPEAKER awarded the floor to Mr. FILLMORE, and his resolution was read.

Mr. MEDILL rose and said that the resolution was out of order, and insisted upon the reading of the papers without interruption.

The CLERK again commenced the reading, but was again interrupted by

Mr. LINCOLN, who submitted to gentlemen whether it would not be better to postpone the reading till to-morrow, when they would have a whole hour, in the course of the morning, to hear it in.

Mr. DROMGOOLE attempted to obtain the floor, and moved the printing of the report; but on repeated calls to order and calls for the reading, resumed his seat.

The CLERK then resumed the reading of the report, and continued, without interruption, till he had finished it; when

Mr. PETRIKIN rose and inquired of the CHAIR what was the question before the House.

The SPEAKER replied that the question was on the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FILLMORE.]

Mr. PETRIKIN then moved the previous question on it.

Mr. FILLMORE contended that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had no right to move the previous question, as he was entitled to the floor, and had not relinquished it.

The CHAIR said that the gentleman from New York was entitled to the floor; and therefore the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was not in order.

Mr. DUNCAN. I want to know whether it is in order for the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] to interrupt the reading of a report while the CLERK was reading it. and, by offering a resolution, get the right to the floor.

The SPEAKER said that the gentleman from New York obtained the floor while the reading was suspended, and nobody objecting to his resolution, it was received.

Mr. DUNCAN said that the gentleman from New York interrupted the reading of the report, and had no right to offer his resolution: he would therefore appeal from the decision of the CHAIR, giving the floor to the gentleman.

Mr. PETRIKIN insisted on his right to the floor. He moved the previous question as soon as the reading of the report was finished, and before the gentleman from New York rose. The CHAIR, he said, recognised his right to the floor, and told him what was the question before the House. On being thus recognised by the SPEAKER, he moved the previous question.

The CHAIR said that when he recognised the gentleman of Pennsylvania's right to the floor, he was not aware that the gentleman from New York would claim it—but as the gentleman from New York had not yielded the floor, he was entitled to it when the gentleman from Pennsylvania rose.

Some gentleman here, the Reporter could not tell who, called for the printing of the report, but so many objections were made, that the question was not put.

Mr. DUNCAN called for the question on the appeal.

The CHAIR requested the gentleman from Ohio to reduce his appeal to writing.

Mr. CAMPBELL, chairman of the committee, suggested that as the report would come up the first thing in the morning, the House had better adjourn. Mr. C. made a motion to that effect.

Mr. PROFFIT here moved an adjournment.

Mr. DUNCAN. I have the floor, I suppose, while I am writing out my appeal, by direction of the CHAIR: nobody can move an adjournment while I have a right to the floor.

Mr. PROFFIT. I made a motion to adjourn, and wish to know whether the gentleman from Ohio, by his appeal to sustain the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, can deprive me of the right to have the question taken on my motion.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PROFFIT] had a right to move an adjournment.

Mr. PROFFIT renewed his motion to adjourn.

Mr. DROMGOOLE called for the yeas and nays; which being ordered, the question was decided in the negative that way—yeas 71, nays 90.

Mr. DUNCAN'S appeal was then read.

Some conversation then took place as to the phraseology of the appeal in which the SPEAKER, Mr. FILLMORE, and Mr. DUNCAN, participated, Mr. FILLMORE stating that the point was not correctly stated, and that when he offered his resolution the reading of the report was suspended by general consent, and that it was so understood by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] who endeavored to offer a resolution at the same time.

The SPEAKER thought the facts were not exactly stated as they happened. His impressions were that the reading of the report was suspended by general consent, and that the resolution of the gentleman from New York was received in the same way. The CHAIR, he said, was often placed in difficulty by propositions to receive motions by general consent. Some gentlemen would make objections and then withdraw them, and from the confusion often produced on such occasions, the CHAIR was often led, unintentionally, into error, particularly when the proposition is permitted to be read for information only.

Mr. MEDILL was satisfied that the SPEAKER was in error in saying that the gentleman from New York had moved his resolution before the reading of the report was called for. The CLERK was reading the report when he was interrupted by the gentleman from New York, and he [the CLERK] stopped, as a matter of course, when the gentleman interrupted him, and he rose, and, addressing the SPEAKER, offered his resolution. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DROMGOOLE] rose nearly at the same time, and offered a resolution, but the CHAIR awarded the floor to the gentleman from New York. He then, as he supposed both gentlemen to be out of order, rose, and demanded if he had not a right to have the reading of the report proceeded with.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said, that when he discovered that the reading of the report was suspended, he supposed that it was done by general consent; and therefore it was that he endeavored to offer his resolution. If the reading of the report was not suspended by general consent, as he learnt from the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MEDILL,] it was clear that the gentleman from New York was out of order, when he offered his resolution. Until he heard the explanation of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MEDILL,] he was under the impression that the reading was suspended by general consent. There was so much confusion in the hall at the time, that he, as well as the SPEAKER, might have been led into error.

Mr. PETRIKIN insisted on his right to the floor, and said it was of no consequence whether the gentleman from New York was out of order or not, when he offered his resolution, as he [Mr. P.] made his motion immediately on the conclusion of the reading of the report, and the SPEAKER then recognised his right to the floor.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky called for the reading of the documents accompanying the report.

Mr. CRAIG'S idea was that the whole matter was out of order. If the reading of the report was called for, as they were told by the gentleman from Ohio and others, the gentleman from New York had no right to offer his resolution while it was being read. He, himself, rose out of order, and wished to get the unanimous consent of the House for printing the report, and an adjournment. It was rather an appeal to the good sense of the House, than a regular motion to the CHAIR. He knew he was out of order, and when he found it was the wish of the House to proceed with the business, he too his seat.

[Much disorder prevailed at this time, a number of gentlemen trying to get the floor, and addressing the CHAIR.]

The SPEAKER said he would make a short statement of the facts, so far as he understood them. The CHAIR supposed, when he received the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FILLMORE,] that the reading of the report was suspended by general consent. He would, however, state it was always a difficult matter for the CHAIR to decide when motions were received by general consent, or only suffered to be read for information, as much confusion generally attends such propositions, and gentlemen who make objections often withdraw them. In this case, the CHAIR believed that the reading was suspended by general consent; but it seemed that, in this, he was mistaken, for the Senator from Ohio states that he called for the reading of the report. There was a difficulty which had occurred to the CHAIR since his decision, and this was whether the member from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] did not lose his right to the floor by not claiming it until after the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PETRIKIN] had risen and been recognised by the CHAIR. This question would, however, be decided by the question on the appeal taken by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. DUNCAN.] As there was some difficulty as to the phraseology of the appeal, the CHAIR would, with the assent of the gentleman from Ohio, state the question on the appeal as simply appealing from his decision, giving the floor to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DUNCAN assented.

After some remarks from Mr. BRIGGS, not heard,

The SPEAKER stated the question on the appeal.

Mr. CHAPMAN would ask of the House if any one could understand the true state of the case better than the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MEDILL,] who was a member of the committee, had made himself fully acquainted with the subject, and was near to the gentleman of New York and to the CHAIR when the two motions on which the appeal rested were made.

Mr. CHAPMAN was called to order, and took his seat.

Mr. FILLMORE demanded the yeas and nays on the appeal, which were ordered.

Mr. PROFFIT said he rose to a point of order.

Several gentlemen. There is a point of order now pending.

The previous question on the appeal was then seconded by the House, and the main question having been put, resulted—yeas 82, nays 88.

So the decision of the CHAIR not being sustained, the effect was to award the floor to

Mr. PETRIKIN, who withdrew his motion for the previous question, and asked of the CHAIR what was the question before the House.

The SPEAKER said it was on the motion to recommit, made by the gentleman from New York, Mr. FILLMORE.

After a desultory discussion on the question of order as to the question before the House, in which Messrs. TAYLOR of Ohio, FILLMORE, and PETRIKIN, took part,

The CHAIR again stated the question before the House; when

Mr. PETRIKIN submitted the following substitute for Mr. FILLMORE'S resolution, by way of amendment, and moved the previous question on it.

Whereas it appears by the report of the Committee of Elections that Philemon Dickerson, Peter D. Vroom, Daniel B, Ryall, William R. Cooper, and Joseph Kille, received the greatest number of lawful votes cast in the State of New Jersey at the election holden in that State for Representatives in the Twenty-sixth Congress:

Resolved, That Philemon Dickerson, Peter D. Vroom, Daniel B. Ryall, William Cooper, and Joseph Kille, are entitled to take their seats in the House of Representatives as members of the Twenty-sixth Congress; and that the Speaker of the House, on their presenting themselves, qualify them as such: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the investigation into said election from being continued in the manner heretofore authorized by a majority of the Committee of Elections, on the application of the five claimants for said seats.

Mr. FILLMORE enquired whether the amendment was in order.

The CHAIR said it was read for information.

Mr. PETRIKIN said he would advise the gentleman from New York never to fire until he was loaded. The well meaning part of the country was tired of hearing of the continued debates on this New Jersey question. He was tired of hearing gentlemen on the other side continually complaining that poor New Jersey was unrepresented on that floor. Enough had been said of broad seals, prima facie evidence, &c.; and as the committee had now reported which five of the ten contending candidates had been duly elected by the people, he wanted the matter settled at once, and the right members put in their seats. It was with this view that he had offered his resolution.

Mr. FILLMORE said his point of order was this: The gentleman's amendment, by striking out all after the word "whereas," did not leave a substantive portion of the resolution. Again: his resolution was to recommit the report, while the amendment offered a different and distinct proposition to admit five members to their seats.

The CHAIR informed the gentleman from New Yark that, the previous question being called, it was not in order to debate.

Mr. FILLMORE said as he was not permitted to say any thing in its favor, he would withdraw his point of order.

Mr. CONNOR then moved a call of the House; but, from the confusion and noise prevailing, the motion was not entertained.

Mr. PROFFIT said he had called fifty times, as he could prove, for the reading of the papers accompanying the report. I call for it now, said he; but in this scene of revolution and Jacobinism, no man has his rights.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman had a right to call for the reading of papers, about which he was called on to vote.

Mr. HOPKINS here moved that the House adjourn; and the yeas and nays being called for and ordered, the question was decided in the negative—yeas 75, nays 92.

Mr. PRENTISS of New York moved a call of the House.

Mr. WELLER called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD moved an adjournment.

Mr. PROFFIT called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the question was in that way decided in the affirmative—yeas 85, nays 72.

So the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, March 6, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a report of the Secretary of the Navy, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of January 29, 1840, transmitting a list of officers admitted to the roll of navy pensioners between the 30th of June, 1800, and the 1st of January, 1837, and specifying their rank, the degree and nature of disability, and the amount of monthly pension; which was laid on the table.

Mr. GRUNDY presented the memorial of Edmund P. Gaines, proposing a system of national defence, and recommending the same to the adoption of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented fifteen memorials, praying for an increase of duties on imported silks; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. B. also presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Philadelphia, praying the passage of a bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLAYTON presented the petition of Olivia W. Cannon, widow of Joseph S. Cannon, deceased, late an officer in the Navy of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PIERCE presented the petition of the widow of Robert Willey, deceased, late a soldier in the Revolutionary war, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The CHAIR submitted resolutions passed by the Senate of the Territory of Florida, instructing the Delegate of said Territory in Congress to oppose the passage of any law for dividing said Territory; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Florida Territory.

Mr. MERRICK presented the petition of a number of citizens of Alexandria, praying the erection of a marine hospital at or near that place; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PORTER presented the petition of citizens of Kalamazoo and St. Joseph, in the State of Michigan, praying that the provisions of the preemption law of June 22, 1838, may be extended to persons engaged in the cultivation of the soil at the time of its passage, with a view to a future settlement thereon; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Tyler Spafford, reported a bill for his relief: which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the memorial of Casper W. Wever, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the claim of Mary Neal, reported a bill for her relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the petition of Jacob Pennel, reported a bill for the relief of Jacob Pennell, and others, owners of the Eliza, of Brunswick; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution submitted some days since by Mr. TAPPAN:

Resolved, That the 47th rule be amended so as in the last paragraph thereof to read:

"Two reporters for each of the daily papers, and one reporter for each tri-weekly paper, printed and published in the city of Washington, whose names shall be communicated in writing, by the editors of those papers to the Secretary of the Senate, and who shall confine themselves to the seats now provided for them.

After some remarks from Mr. PRESTON, he moved to lay the resolution on the table; which was negatived—ayes 17, noes 25.

Mr. PRESTON then moved to amend by striking out "city of Washington," and inserting "District of Columbia," which was disagreed to—ayes 16, noes 25.

The resolution was then agreed to—ayes 25, noes 16.

THE SPECIAL ORDER.

The report of the Select Committee on the assumption of State debts, was then taken up, and after an animated debate, in which Messrs. DAVIS, BUCHANAN, PRESTON, KING, NORVELL, CLAY, of Kentucky, BROWN, and CALHOUN, participated,

Mr. WEBSTER moved an adjournment; which was decided in the negative.

The question then coming up on the resolutions reported by the Select Committee,

The CHAIR stated the question as follows:

The Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. BUCHANAN, had moved to amend the resolutions of the committee, by adding the following:

Resolved, That the debts of the several States, so far as they are known to the Senate, have been contracted in the exercise of the undoubted right and constitutional power of said States respectively, and that there is no ground to warrant any doubt of the ability or disposition of those States to fulfil their contracts.

For which amendment, Mr. NORVELL offered the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That while the Senate of the United States is fully impressed with the importance and correctness of the principles contained in the foregoing resolutions, it is not intended thereby to create any doubt of the constitutional right of the States to contract debts, nor of their resources, disposition, or ability to fulfil the engagements which they have contracted for purposes of internal improvement, as well as for other objects within the range of their reserved powers.

The question was now on the substitute of Mr. NORVELL; which was agreed to—ayes 25, noes 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, and Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Knight, Merrick, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Webster, and White—18.

The question then being on the adoption of Mr. BUCHANAN's motion as amended, after some remarks by Messrs. SMITH of Indiana, CRITTENDEN, NORVELL, WEBSTER, and KING,

On motion of Mr. KING, and by unanimous consent, it was considered as withdrawn for the present.

The substitute proposed by Mr. CRITTENDEN for the resolutions of the committee, was then taken up, and was as follows:

Resolved, That the debts of the several States, so far as they are known to the Senate, have been contracted in the exercise of the undoubted right and constitutional power of said States respectively, and that there is no ground to warrant any doubt of the ability or disposition of those States to fulfil their contracts.

Resolved, That it would be just and proper to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States, in fair and rateable proportions, and that the condition of such of the States as have contracted debts is such at the present moment of pressure and difficulty as to render such distribution especially expedient and important.

After some remarks by Mr. PRESTON, the question on the substitute was taken, and it was rejected—ayes 17, noes 28, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Betts, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Knight, Merrick, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, and Wright—28.

Mr. PRESTON then moved to amend the resolutions of the committee by striking out all after the word resolved, and inserting the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That the debts of the several States, so far as they are known to the Senate, have been contracted in the exercise of the undoubted right and constitutional power of said States respectively, and that there is no ground to warrant any doubt of the ability or disposition of those States to fulfil their contracts.

After some remarks by Messrs. WEBSTER and KING,

Mr. NORVELL said that the amendment offered by him, and voted on by the Senate, had been withdrawn, with the general understanding that no other amendment should be offered until a vote was taken on the resolutions of the committee. The course taken by the Senator from South Carolina would compel him to move the proposition which he had withdrawn, as a substitute for the Senator's amendment; and he accordingly made that motion.

Mr. PRESTON then withdrew his motion to amend.

The first resolution of the Select Committee was then read, as follows:

1. Resolved, That the assumption, directly or indirectly, by the General Government, of the debts which have been, or may be, contracted by the States for local objects or State purposes, would be unjust, both to the States and to the people.

Mr. PRENTISS moved to strike out the words "directly or indirectly," and insert "or guarantee."

After some remarks by Messrs. PRENTISS, KNIGHT, and GRUNDY,

Mr. WEBSTER moved an adjournment, which was negatived—ayes 10, noes 27.

The question was then taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. PRENTISS, and decided in the negative—yeas 6, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Betts, Dixon, Knight, Phelps, Prentiss, and Ruggles—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, and Wright—27.

Mr. RUGGLES then moved to amend by striking out "or State purposes." Mr. R. assigned as a reason, that the debt recently incurred by the State of Maine, in defending her frontier, might be considered a State debt, and, by this resolution, the future payment of it debarred.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, as his colleague had objected to this resolution, and as he intended to vote for it, he wished to give a reason for so doing. He considered the debt incurred by his State, in defending the frontier, as not the debt of Maine, but as the debt of the United States, which would, he expected, be paid without hesitation by the General Government.

Mr. BENTON. Certainly. The boundary of Maine was the boundary of the United States. [In this sentiment there was a very general acquiescence.]

After some further remarks by Messrs. RUGGLES and WALL,

Mr. NORVELL said that the defence of the State of Maine was the defence of the United States. The protection of the Northeastern boundary of Maine was the protection of the boundary of the nation. The expenses incurred in that defence and protection were national expenses; and he would tell the Senator from Maine [Mr. RUGGLES] that, if he came here to claim reimbursement of the moneys expended in the maintenance of her boundary rights against a foreign power, on the ground of its being a local object or a State purpose, he would, in his judgment, go home without success. The worthy colleague of the Senator [Mr. WILLIAMS] had taken the right view of the subject. The resolution against the assumption of the State debts contracted for local objects and State purposes, had no reference to such cases as the defence of a State against foreign aggression.

Mr RUGGLES demanded the yeas and nays on his amendment, but they were not ordered, and it was negatived without a division.

The question was then taken on the first resolution, and it was agreed to—ayes 30, nay 1, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Andrson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, and Wright—30.

NAY—Mr. Smith of Indiana—1.

The second resolution was then read as follows:

2. Resolved, That such assumption would be highly inexpedient, and dangerous to the Union of the States.

After some remarks from Mr. DIXON, it was agreed to—ayes 28, noes 3, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, and Wright—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Dixon, Smith of Indiana, and White—3.

The third resolution was then read as follows:

3. Resolved, That such assumption would be wholly unauthorized by, and in violation of, the Constitution of the United States, and utterly repugnant to all the objects and purposes for which the Federal Union was formed.

And it was agreed to—ayes 29, noes 3, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, and Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Dixon, Smith of Indiana, and White—3.

The fourth resolution was then read as follows:

4. Resolved, That to set apart the public lands, or the revenues arising therefrom, for the beforementioned purposes, would be equally unjust, inexpedient, and unconstitutional.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend by striking out all after the word Resolved, and insert, "That the assumption of such debts, either openly, by a direct promise to pay them, or disguisedly, by giving security for their payment, or by creating surplus revenue, or by applying the national funds to pay them, would be a gross and flagrant violation of the Constitution, and wholly unwarranted by the letter or spirit of that instrument;" which was agreed to, without a division.

Mr. NORVELL then moved to amend, by adding the following:

5. Resolved, That while the Senate of the United States is fully impressed with the importance and correctness of the principles contained in the foregoing resolutions, it is not intended thereby to create any doubt of the constitutional right of the States to contract debts, nor of their resources, disposition, or ability to fulfil the engagements which they have contracted for purposes of internal improvement, as well as for other subjects within the range of their reserved powers.

Which was agreed to—yeas 23, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Sturgeon, Wall, Williams, and Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Hubbard, Pierce, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Tappan, and White—7.

Mr. BETTS then offered the following as an amendment

Resolved, That the distribution of the public lands, or the revenues arising therefrom, among the several States would be equally unjust, unconstitutional, and inexpedient.

Mr. WRIGHT asked for the yeas and nays on this amendment. He wished to see if the Senator from Connecticut would vote for his own proposition; or if, at this late hour of the evening, propositions are made which the Senators offering them will not vote for themselves.

Mr. BETTS said he would not vote for it, but his object was to get a direct vote of the Senate on the proposition.

After some remarks from Mr. CLAY of Alabama, on the impropriety and irregularity of offering a proposition identical with one which had just been acted on,

Mr. KING said, if the CHAIR decided the motiod to be in order, an appeal could be taken from the decision of the CHAIR, and it would then be time enough to debate the motion.

The CHAIR decided the motinn to be out of order.

Mr. PRENTISS then moved to further amend the resolution by inserting the following:

"But nothing contained in the foregoing resolutions is to be understood as denying or questioning the right or power of Congress to make an equal distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, among all the States, according to the terms and conditions of the deeds of cession."

The amendment was disagreed to—ayes 6, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Betts, Dixon, Prentiss, Robinson, Smith of Indiana, and White—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Sevier, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, and Wright—25.

So the resolutions were agreed to, as follows:

1. Resolved, That the assumption, directly or indirectly, by the General Government, of the debts which have been, or may be, contracted by the States for local objects or State purposes, would be unjust, both to the States and to the people.

2. Resolved, That such assumption would be highly inexpedient, and dangerous to the Union of the States.

3. Resolved, That such assumption would be wholly unauthorized by, and in violation of, the Constitution of the United States, and utterly repugnant to all the objects and purposes for which the Federal Union was formed.

4. Resolved, That the assumption of such debts, either openly, by a direct promise to pay them, or disguisedly, by giving security for their payment, or by creating surplus revenue, or by applying the national funds to pay them, would be a gross and flagrant violation of the Constitution, and wholly unwarranted by the letter or spirit of that instrument.

5. Resolved, That while the Senate of the United States is fully impressed with the importance and correctness of the principles contained in the foregoing resolutions, it is not intended thereby to create any doubt of the constitutional right of the States to contract debts, nor of their resources, disposition, or ability to fulfil the engagements which they have contracted for purposes of internal improvement, as well as for other subjects within the range of their reserved powers.

On motion, the Senate, at 8 o'clock, adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, March 6, 1840.

Mr. GATES, by general consent, made a statement in relation to the following portion of Mr. BYNUM's speech, as published in the Globe of last evening:

From the Le Roy Gazette.

"'Very much like, indeed! The editor of the Ohio paper abandoned the Whigs because they nominated the Abolitionists, and joined the Loco Focos because they went for the dough-faces, while we left the Jackson party because it adhered to slavery, and united with the Whigs, because they supported Abolition!'

"This paper was then edited by Mr. GATES, now a member on this floor."

The substance of the statement of Mr. G. was, that although he was once the editor of the Le Roy Gazette, he did not edit the paper when the above article was published, but was a member on this floor. The paper was then, and at present, edited by Cyrus Thompson, jun.

Mr. BYNUM said there could be no doubt but that a mistake had been made, as until this morning he was not aware that the gentleman from New York had resigned the editorship of that paper.

The House then resumed the consideration of the report made last evening by Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee of Elections, on the N. Jersey case.

Mr. PETRIKIN modified his resolution, by adding "in the manner heretofore authorized, and by a majority of the Committee of Elections."

Mr. CAMPBELL appealed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his motion for the previous question, in order to allow an opportunity for the minority of the committee to make a report, so that the subject might take the usual course, the testimony be printed, and the subject postponed to a day certain.

Mr. PETRIKIN refused to withdraw his motion.

Mr. BRIGGS asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Whereas this House did, by a resolution passed on the 13th day of January last, refer the case of the New Jersey contested elestion, with all the papers relating thereto, to the Ccommittee of Elections, with instructions to inquire who were entitled to occupy the five seats as Representatives from the State of New Jersey; and whereas said committee did proceed in said inquiry, until the parties contesting for said seats, by permission and under the authority of said committee, left the city, and proceeded to the State of New Jersey, for the purpose of taking testimony in relation to their respective title to occupy seats upon the floor of this House—the time allowed by the committee for that purpose being until the 2d Monday of April next; and whereas by another resolution passed on the 28th February last, this House instructed said committee forthwith to report which five of the persons claiming to be elected members from the State of New Jersey received the greatest number of lawful votes of the people of said State; and whereas said committee did, on the 5th day of March instant, report that PHILEMON DICKERSON, PETER D. VROOM, JOSEPH KILLE, WILLIAM R. COOPER, and DANIEL B. RYALD, received the greatest number of lawful votes, without having first examined the evidence as to the legality of votes alleged to be illegal, or as to the legality of certain polls alleged to be illegal, without notifying or hearing the parties; and whereas, a resolution is now pending declaring that PHILEMON DICKERSON, PETER D. VROOM, JOSEPH KILLE, WILLIAM P. COOPER, and DANIEL B. RYALL, are entitled to take seats as members of the Twenty-sixth Congress for the State of New Jersey, now, to the end that justice may be done, and that this House will not proceed to decide so grave a question as that of the right of a State to a representation on this floor, in the absence of, and without hearing, the parties interested,

Resolved, That it is the right as well of the persons claiming seats, as of the people whom they claim to represent, to be present, and heard before their title to seats shall be passed upon by this House.

Resolved, That the whole subject of said election be postponed until the second Monday of April next, and that the report and all the papers relating thereto be printed, and that the Speaker be directed to notify the parties claiming seats, that they may, if they see fit, be present on said day, and be heard in the premises at the bar of this House.

Objection being made, Mr. BRIGGS moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose. On this motion the yeas and nays were ordered, and resulted—yeas 95, nays 112.

So the rules were not suspended.

The CHAIR ordered the documents accompanying the report os the Committee of Elections to be read.

Mr. CAMPBELL said he had appealed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PETRIKIN] to withdraw his motion for the previous question, but in vain. He now, thorefore, moved to lay the resolution of Mr. FILLMORE, with the amendment moved by Mr. PETRIKIN, on the table.

The CHAIR reminded Mr. CAMPBELL that that motion, if it prevailed, would carry the report itself to the table.

Mr. CAMPBELL thereupon withdrew his motion.

The reading of the papers commenced, and having proceeded some time—

Mr. EVERETT withdrew his call for the reading, and it was suspended.

Mr. RIVES inquired whether it would be in order to move to suspend the further consideration of the report of the committee till Tuesday next, and to make it the special order for that day at 12 o'clock, and so to continue every day at that hour, till the subject should be disposed of?

The CHAIR replied it could only be done by universal consent.

Objection was made.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut inquired whether the previous question had been withdrawn?

The CHAIR replied in the negative.

Mr. RIVES modified his motion so as to make the report the special order at 1 o'clock.

Objection being made—

Mr. RIVES moved to suspend the rules.

Mr. BELL rose to order, and insisted that the amendment of Mr. PETRIKIN was out of order, as it had no relation to Mr. FILLMORE's resolution, to which it had been moved.

The SPEAKER replied that, on examination, he had himself come to the same conclusion; but as action had since been had, it was now too late to raise the question of order.

Mr. BELL contended that, as no decision had yet been had on the resolution or amendment, it was not too late for the CHAIR to revise its decision.

Mr. TURNEY opposed that view, and referred to the previous practice of the House.

At this point, the morning hour having expired,

Mr. MONROE called for the orders of the day.

Mr. BELL said he should not appeal.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS still insisted that it was not too late:

The question was now put on Mr. RIVES's motion to suspend the rules, but it failed—yeas 110, nays 94: (not two-thirds.)

[On the name of Mr. EVERETT being called, he inquired whether the previous question was withdrawn? The SPEAKER informed him it was not. Mr. E. said, then I answer, no.]

The residue of the day (it being now 2 o'clock) was taken up in the discussion of a point of order.

The SPEAKER, by general consent, had presented to the House a certain paper, understood to be testimony relating to the contested election in New Jersey, and which had been referred, on motion, to the Committee of Elections.

This having been done in the manner in which communications on the Speaker's table are usually disposed of, by a formal motion, indeed, but without general attention having been called to the import of the paper; and the Speaker being in the act of passing to other business,

Mr. FILLMORE rose and called for the reading of the document, at the same time submitting a motion that it be printed.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected.

The SPEAKER said the paper had already been referred, and the motion of the gentleman was not in order, except by general consent.

Mr. EVERETT suggested to Mr. FILLMORE that he could attain his object by moving a reconsideration.

Mr. FILLMORE thereupon moved to reconsider the vote by which the paper had been referred. [This is a motion which, under the rule, takes precedence of all other questions, except a motion to adjourn.]

Mr. F. then proceeded to say. I suppose I am not at liberty to say any thing of what took place in the committee; but I take it for granted that I may, by way of argument, speak, by supposition, of any thing else. I will suppose that there was a committee in the British House of Commons on the subject of an election—

Mr. PETRIKIN rose and inquired if the gentleman was in order in proceeding to debate his motion at this time?

The SPEAKER said the motion to reconsider took precedence over all other motions.

Mr. PETIKIN. But not the consideration of the motion.

The SPEAKER said that the motion and the consideration of the motion could not be separated.

Mr. PETRIKIN then submitted the point of order, that the SPEAKER having announced the orders of the day, (which were private bills,) a motion to reconsider could not be debated and considered, save by a vote of two-thirds.

The SPEAKER having ruled to the contrary, and that the motion to reconsider was now before the House for consideration—

Mr. PETRIKIN appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. FILLMORE required that the gentleman's point of order be reduced to writing, that it might be entered on the journals. He had been often enough put down, he said, by a mere numerical force, in every thing which related to this New Jersey election. Gentlemen on the other side would hear nothing, see nothing, but would decide.

The SPEAKER called on Mr. PETRIKIN to reduce his point of order to writing; which was done.

Much conversation ensued, and statements were made by several gentlemen as to the state of the facts, as set forth in Mr. P's written point of order.

When a motion was made by Mr. HOLLEMAN to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. RANDOLPH asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Much rapid and desultory conversation followed.

Mr. FILLMORE inquired of the Chair whether the motion to lay the appeal on the table, if it should prevail, would carry with it the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER said that, in his opinion, it would.

Mr. FILLMORE said then the SPEAKER would do indirectly that which he could not do directly. A gentleman entitled to the floor might thus be cut off in the midst of his remarks by a mere incidental point of order, having no connection with the main subject of debate.

The SPEAKER said a motion to lay on the table was not debatable.

Mr. FILLMORE appealed from the decision of the CHAIR, that the motion to lay the appeal on the table, if it prevailed, carried with it the motion to reconsider.

If such a construction of the rule was to be recognised, (Mr. F. said,) every man here would hold his right to the floor at the will of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr PETRIKIN.]

Mr. DAWSON said that, for the first time in his life, he rose to a point of order.

The SPEAKER said he could entertain no more questions of order till these pending were decided.

The appeal of Mr. FILLMORE was then debated briefly by Messrs. LEADBETTER, GRAVES, ALFORD, BRIGGS, and BANKS.

After which Mr. BANKS moved to lay it upon the table.

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

And the SPEAKER having stated the grounds of his decision—

The question was then taken on the motion to lay on the table the second appeal, to wit, the appeal of Mr. FILLMORE from the decision of the Chair, that tho motion to lay the first appeal on the table, if it should prevail, would carry with it the motion to reconsider.

And it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 98, nays 76.

So the second appeal was laid on the table.

[Under the decision of the Chair, as given above, this vote would have taken with it the previous appeal, and the motion to reconsider. But]

Mr. FILLMORE rose and asked if he had a right to proceed in his remarks?

The SPEAKER said the gentleman had not the right.

Mr. FILLMORE then said he must, with all respect for the CHAIR, take an appeal, which, at the request of the CHAIR, was reduced to writing as follows:

"Mr. FILLMORE had the the floor, and was speaking on a motion to reconsider a vote of the House. He was called to order. The SPEAKER decided he was in order; from this decision an appeal was taken. A motion was then made to lay that appeal on the table. On this a question was raised, whether the motion to lay on the table was in order? The SPEAKER decided it was, and on this an appeal was taken. A motion was made to lay this appeal on the table; which was put and carried.

"The SPEAKER then decided that the original motion to reconsider is laid on the table, and that Mr. FILLMORE is deprived of his right to proceed in the debate.

"From this decision Mr. FILLMORE appeals, insisting that the original judgment of the CHAIR stands, as it is not reversed, and that he is entitled to the floor, on the original motion to reconsider."

The appeal was debated at length by Mr. BARNARD, (who suggested to Mr. FILLMORE a modification of the form of his appeal,) and by Messrs. POPE and PETRIKIN.

When Mr. PETRIKIN moved the previous question; but at the request of the SPEAKER, who said that he had found a decision which seemed to go against the one which he had given, withdrew the motion.

The appeal was further debated by Messrs. CLIFFORD, BRIGGS, and HOLLEMAN.

The SPEAKER then gave the floor to Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky, who yielded it, however, to enable the SPEAKER to make a statement.

The SPEAKER then cited a case which had occurred to the Congress of 1834, [the particulars of which the Reporter could distinctly hear,] in which the then SPEAKER had decided that an appeal was a separate and independent question. There was also, the SPEAKER said, a decision of his own, at the present session, by which it had been decided that the appeal was an independent question. This certainly was opposed to his own views; but, finding such a decision, and finding that such had been the previous decisions, he felt bound to conform to them, and must decide that the question now before the House was on the appeal of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

This appeal (see above) was taken from a decision of the CHAIR that the motion to reconsider could be debated and considered now, without a vote of two-thirds.

And the immediately pending question thereon was the motion submitted by Mr. HOLLEMAN that the appeal do lie on the table.

Mr. TURNEY now moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. TOLAND urged the gentleman to withdraw his motion, to enable him to offer a resolution.

Mr. TURNEY declining,

The question was taken and carried;

And the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, March 7, 1840.

After the journal had been read,

Mr. DUNCAN inquired whether the report of Committee of Elections on the New Jersey election, with the resolution of Mr. PETRIKIN, was not the grst business in order.

The SPEAKER responded that, in his opinion, the first business in order was the appeal of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in relation to papers referred to the Committee of Eelections yesterday.

On motion of Mr. TOLAND, it was

Resolved, That the use of this hall be allowed for an exhibition of the pupils of the Pennsylvania Institution for the education of the Blind, under the direction of Dr. Thomas Rhoads, Principal of the Institution, on Monday morning next, from 10 to 12 o'clock.

Mr. MONTGOMERY gave notice, in writing, that he would offer the following amendment to the 126th rule of the House: "Strike out all from the word 'therefor,' in said rule, to the end thereof." The rule now stands as follows:

"No standing rule or order of this House shall be rescinded or changed without a day's notice being given of the motion therefor; nor shall any rule be suspended, except by a vote of at least two thirds of the members present. Nor shall the order of business, as established by the rules of the House, be postponed or changed, except by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members present."

Should the rule be amended, it will read as follows:

"No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice being given of the motion therefor."

This amendment is intended to give a majority of the people's representatives on this floor, at all times, the power to proceed to the transaction of the important public business of the country, and to expunge from our rules (as I believe) that most unjust and tyrannical rule which begins, "Two-thirds of the people's representatives to transact the most important public business of this nation, except at particular times and under particular circumstances."

The SPEAKER then announced the business before the House to be the appeal of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr, PETRIKIN,] from a decision of the CHAIR on yesterday, "that the motion to reconsider could be debated and considered now without a vote of two-thirds."

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. HOLLEMAN to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. HOLLEMAN, being entitled to the floor, said that, with a view of saving time, he would withdraw the motion to lay on the table, so that the question could at once be taken on the appeal. He then moved the previous question on the appeal, which, being seconded, the main question on the appeal was taken, and resulted in the decision of the CHAIR being sustained—yeas 88, nays 86.

Mr. DUNCAN here rose to a question of order. He contended that the first business before the House was the report of the Committee of Elections on the New Jersey case, with the resolution of Mr. PETRIKIN, on which the previous question had been ordered. In his opinion, nothing could intervene or prevent the immediate action of the House on that previous question. He urged that the whole business, out of which the appeal had arisen, was out of order.

Mr. D. at the request of the CHAIR, reduced his point of order to writing.

"It is out of order to intercept the previous question by the introduction of any question, discussion, or reading of evidence.

"This House, by resolution, required the Committee of Elections to report forthwith, who of the ten contesting members from New Jersey had received a majority of the lawful votes at the Congressional election of 1838. The committee did report in conformity with the resolution. The report was in favor of Mr. DICKERSON and his associates. The report was read: a resolution was offered to recommit, and for other purposes. A resolution was offered, by way of amendment, the object of which was to authorize Mr. DICKERSON and his associates to take their seats; and on that resolution the previous question was moved. It is out of order to entertain any proposition, which will intercept the immediate action of the House upon the previous question now pending. Such is the character of the measure now before the House, which I contend is out of order."

The SPEAKER decided that the motion of Mr. FILLMORE to reconsider the vote by which certain papers relating to the New Jersey contested election had been referred to the Committee of Elections, took precedence over the report of that committee during the morning hour.

From which decision Mr. DUNCAN appealed; and he moved the previous question.

Mr. BRIGGS and Mr. TRIPLETT severally submitted to the CHAIR that this identical point of order had been already decided, and that it was not in order to raise the same question again.

The SPEAKER said he was of opinion that the question was the same as that just decided; but other gentlemen might differ, and time might be saved by putting the question.

And, after some conversation, the question was put, and the demand for the previous question (ayes 97, noes 78) was seconded.

And the main question (to wit, "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House?") was ordered to be now taken.

Mr. TURNEY called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 99, nays 89.

So the House affirmed the decision of the CHAIR.

And the question thus recurring on the motion of Mr. FILLMORE to reconsider the vote by which the said papers had been referred to the Committee of Elections—

Mr. FILLMORE proceeded to address the House (hypothetically) in relation to the proceedings of the committee.

He entered into the general merits of the contested election and made some severe strictures on the report of the committee, the majority of which he censured for refusing to consider certain depositions in relation to the votes of South Amboy, and of suppressing them by the force of numerical strength. The substance of his remarks is embodied in the following preamble to his resolution of last week.

Mr. FILLMORE, after speaking some time, called for the reading of the testimony which had been referred to the Committee, and which it would be the effect of his motion, should it prevail, to bring back and place under the control of the House.

Mr. STEENROD objected.

Mr. FILLMORE said he had never read the papers in question, and did not know what they contained.

Mr. MEDILL inquired whether it would be proper to ask Mr. F. how those papers were obtained.

Mr. CHAPMAN opposed the reading as out of order.

Mr. PETRIKIN also objected, and spoke to the question of order.

The CHAIR ruled the reading to be in order, and, in support of that decision, read the rule applying to the case.

Mr. CHAPMAN now said that he was satisfied the reading was in order, and he withdrew his objection to it.

The reading of the testimony having proceeded for some time—

Mr. HAND objected to its continuance, and raised a question of order, but the objection was overruled.

And the CLERK continued to read until the papers had been read through.

Mr. FILLMORE then resumed, and continued to address the House for a considerable time longer, when he gave way for Mr. W. THOMPSON to move an adjournment.

The yeas and nays being ordered, Mr. T. withdrew his motion, but it was immediately renewed by Mr. STANLY, but the yeas and nays being taken, it was negatived—yeas 75, nays 85.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. FILLMORE once more proceeded with his speech.

Mr. CAMPBELL, chairman of the Committee of Elections, interposed to explain, and said he had no objection to all the testimony in the case being immediately printed.

Mr. FILLMORE resumed the floor, and spoke without further interruption till he had concluded his argument.

Mr. MEDILL of Ohio, (a member of the committee,) then took the floor in reply. He said he did not rise so much with the view of answering the arguments of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FILLMORE,] in relation to the merits of the report, as to repel the attack which he has thought proper to make upon a part of the committee. The report is not now under consideration. Whenever it shall be, I am prepared, said Mr. M. to show that the facts are correctly set forth, and that the conclusion at which it arrives is sustained by testimony of the most unquestionable character. It is not claimed that the report is based on a complete purgation of the ballot boxes throughout the State. This appears to have been an afterthought of the gentlemen who first claimed seats under the Governor's "seal," and has been resorted to for the purpose of concealing from public observation one of the most extraordinary frauds that has ever been attempted on the suffrages of the people. It is founded, as it professes to be, on the votes received at the polls in pursuance of the laws of that State, by the sworn officers, whose duty it was to conduct the elections. These officers are the only judges of the qualifications of an elector that are known to the laws of New Jersey. They act under the solemnities of an oath, and it is made a penal offence knowingly to receive a vote from any one not possessing the qualifications of an elector as prescribed by the Constitution and laws of the State. It is further set forth that depositions had been submitted to the committee, with the view of showing that votes had been received at the polls, from persons who were not entitled to the right of suffrage, and that one of the officers of election at South Amboy was unlawfully prevented from acting, and another substituted in his place. But if all the votes proved thus to be illegal by competent testimony, were taken from those who received a majority at the polls, the result in relation to any one of the claimants would not be affected. With what propriety, then, said Mr. M. does the gentleman denounce the report as carrying on its face a national lie? On what grounds is the assertion made? Is not the basis on which it proceeds candidly and fairly set forth? Are not the statements made in pursuance thereof strictly correct, and the conclusion at which it arrives, justly inferable? Does the gentleman desire to be understood as answering negatively to any one of these interrogatories? Then let him call for the reading of the testimony, and direct the attention of the House to that part by which he seeks to sustain his assertion. Sir, said Mr. M. I apprehend that the gentleman's imagination has taken the start of his judgment. When he spoke of a paper bearing on its face the evidence of a "national lie," I cannot but think that a certain certificate, verified by the "great seal" of New Jersey, was passing through his mind." That a knowledge of the fact of the Chief Magistrate of a great State certifying to an untruth, under the emblem of its sovereignty, should excite his indignation, and continue to haunt his thoughts, whether on this floor or in the private walks of life, is by no means surprising. The whole proceedings, with the testimony on both sides, are about to be submitted to the public—a tribunal that never fails to do justice, however tardy in its judgment. The report itself is the prosecution of a member of the committee who voted throughout in favor of admitting the certificate members, and whose opinions were not likely to have been biased by any partiality for others.

But, said Mr. M. the gentleman has seen proper to attack the majority of the committee; and by supposing a course of conduct which he desires the House to consider as having taken place in the committee room, has charged them with acts of the grossest injustice. The reasons urged in favor of setting aside the election at South Amboy were, that one of the officers of the election was unlawfully prevented from acting, and another person substituted in his place, and that certain aliens had been permitted to vote. In making up his figured issue, the gentleman has charged the majority of the committee with refusing to consider the depositions that were taken to establish these facts, and seeking to suppress them by the force of numerical strength. Sir, said Mr. M. I am not one of those who will permit assertions of this kind to go forth, where I am personally concerned, although they be hypothetical, without accompanying them with a stamp by which they will be recognised and appreciated, wherever they go. The gentleman was not even satisfied with giving them a durability co-existent with his speech, but has embodied them in a preamble and resolutions, and placed them on the journal of the House. Sir, I ask if these charges are founded in truth? Was no part of the depositions taken by the certificate claimants in relation to the election at South Amboy, read and considered in committee? Nay, further: Were not all the depositions relating to that inquiry, and which were in the possession of the committee when the report was directed to be drawn, read and acted on? And although a part of them were rejected as incompetent by the committee, with but one dissenting voice, have they not all been submitted with the report, for the consideration of the House? With what propriety, then, and on what grounds, does the gentleman assert that these depositions were excluded from the consideration of the committee, when his own name will appear recorded on the question? It may be that they were made with the view of breaking the force of the report, and still keeping the public in doubt respecting the true nature of this infamous transaction.

But, sir, said Mr. M. there are other depositions alleged to have been taken by the certificate claimants in relation to the same subject, and which were referred to the committee since their report was submitted to the House. Although directed to you, and only laid before the House and referred this morning, I think I recognise in them acquaintances of two or three days' standing. On Tuesday last, the chairman assembled the committee, and laid before them the report which he had prepared, in pursuance of the principles previously agreed, with the view, as is understood, of presenting it to the House that morning.

[Here Mr. SMITH interrupted Mr. MEDILL, and required that he observe the rule of order, that forbids any reference to the proceedings of the committee.]

Then, continued Mr. M. I will follow the example that has been set me by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FILLMORE,] and suppose a case, intending to be understood, however, as asserting what has actually taken place. For this purpose I will raise a select committee, and direct its attention, for a few minutes, to the case now in hand. Suppose, then, that the committee had been sitting about five weeks, and had examined all the testimony submitted to its consideration by the respective claimants—that the certificate gentlemen finding the "great seal" was beginning to melt before the burning influence of the poll books, asked further to experiment on the good people of New Jersey, and try if they could discover a sufficient number of illegal votes throughout the State to counterbalance the Democratic majorities in the townships that were suppressed. Suppose, in pursuance of this request, that the committee, by a bare majority, had postponed the further consideration of the case, and authorized the taking of additional testimony, until the second Monday of April next, in the manner and upon notice prescribed by the laws of New Jersey, reserving to itself, however, the right of reporting to the House the facts as they then appeared before the committee. That, on the 28th ult. this House passed a resolution instructing the committee forthwith to report which five of the claimants received the greatest number of lawful votes from the whole State, with all the evidence of that fact in their possession—that they assembled on the next morning, agreed on the basis and principles of a report, and directed the chairman to prepare it accordingly. Suppose that, on the 3d instant, the committee were called together, the report submitted, and found in all things to correspond with the data on which it was previously directed to be made—that at this time a member of the committee drew from his pocket a package, under a sealed envelope, directed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and purporting to be depositions in relation to the New Jersey election, and desired that they might be opened by the chairman, read, and considered, before the report should be submitted to the House. These depositions were said to refer to the manner of holding the election at South Amboy, although nothing of the kind was endorsed on the envelope. This gentleman, whose pocket, instead of the Speaker's desk or chairman's port folio, was made the depository of these depositions, appeared to understand their contents, and professed to have received a letter from one of the claimants whose pretensions they were designed to sustain, explanatory of their import. Such (said Mr. M.) was the time, and such the circumstances under which these depositions appeared before the committee. It is true that it was subsequently proposed to send them to the Speaker of the House, to the end that they might be opened and immediately returned to the committee; and it is true that this proposition was also rejected. Here, then, is the only paper relating to the case, according to my recollection, that was not considered by the committee before the report was presented to the House.

But the language (said Mr. M.) which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] has used towards the majority of the committee, will warrant a further examination into the circumstances, under which these depositions first made their appearance. Let us for a moment advert to the facts in the case.

The consideration of the subject on the ultimate right of the claimants had been postponed until the second Monday of April. They were engaged in taking testimony, with a view to a final adjudication at that period. The committee had not precluded themselves from making a preliminary report, should it be deemed advisable to do so, but the parties had a right to expect that it would be on the evidence examined, when they were personally present. A resolution passed the House on the 28th ultimo, calling for such a report. It was prepared and submitted by the chairman on the 3d instant. Sufficient time had intervened for a letter to reach South Amboy, where depositions were being taken, and a package to be transmitted from thence to this city. The depositions appear. I ask (said Mr. M.) if there were no grounds for him to suspect that all was not right? The order of the committee, as well as the laws of New Jersey, required that they should be certified, sealed up, and either handed or transmitted, by the officer before whom they were taken, to the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

How came they in the pocket of a member of the committee? They were sealed up, but was it done by the officer before whom they were taken, the party whose claims they were intended to sustain, or some one in this city? There was nothing on the envelope by which these facts could be satisfactorily ascertained. They were directed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, but by whose hand? The gentleman, under whose polite attentions they were introduced into the committee room, asserted that they related to the manner of conducting the election at South Amboy: but did they contain all the testimony that was taken on that subject; or did they only embrace the evidence on one side? Were they procured and transmitted to this city without the knowledge of the opposing claimants, and whilst they were actually engaged in examining the rebutting witnesses?

These are inquiries which the gentleman's accompanying letter may have answered very satisfactorily, to his mind; but which, in my opinion, rendered the testimony wholly unworthy of consideration either in the committee or this House. Sir, said Mr. M. I have seen enough of this case to awaken my suspicion, to excite my watchfulness, and to induce me to insist on the observance of those rules that preclude the possibility of fraud. No one, it appears to me, who has examined the subject, and whose mind is unbiased by the party prejudices of the day, can view the course pursued by the county clerks, the Governor and his ten Councilmen, in any other light than as a most daring attempt to control the sovereign will in the selection of public officers. If these depositions were actually forwarded to this city by one of the parties, without the knowledge of the other, and before the examination of witnesses at that place, and in relation to the same subject, had closed, as there was but too much reason to suspect, is there a member on this floor who would seek to make the foundation of a report on a matter of so much interest to the people of this country? And I am assured, on the authority of a letter received in this city, and which now lies before me, that such was the case. The House will, therefore, see whether any evidence was suppressed, and on what foundation the gentleman's assertions rest. The gentleman, said Mr. M. has also insinuated that the majority had assembled after the adoption of the report, and reconsidered a vote, in the absence of three members, that had been taken in full committee. This, like his other charges, is without any just or real foundation in fact. The committee, at the meeting alluded to, was equally as full as when the original vote was taken. If two of the members saw proper to step out of the room after the question was put, and a third declined voting—that third being the gentleman himself—it is no fault of the majority. Their absence was voluntary and intentional, and the charge itself unworthy of so respectable a source. Having already addressed the House at length, said Mr. M. I will not follow the gentleman in discussing the merits of the case. I rose to repel the unjust aspersions which he attempted to cast on a majority of the committee, and to expose to this House and the country, the desperate shifts that were being resorted to for the purpose of sustaining the Governor and Privy Council of New Jersey, in their attempted invasion on the rights and liberties of the people of that patriotic State.

Mr. TURNEY, after some preliminary remarks, moved the previous question on Mr. FILLMORE's motion to reconsider.

Mr. FILLMORE moved a call of the House.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, (another member of the committee,) rose to explain, in reply to Mr. MEDILL, but, amidst loud cries of order, resumed his seat.

The previous question was now seconded.

Mr. FILLMORE renewed his motion for a call of the House; and on this motion Mr. SMITH of Connecticut demanded the yeas and nays: which being ordered—

Mr. GRAVES moved to adjourn.

On this motion Mr. Mr. TURNRY demanded the yeas and nays, which, being taken, resulted as follows—yeas 79, nays 98. So the House refused to adjourn.

The question then recurring on a call of the House, it was decided by yeas and nays in the negative—yeas 61, nays 100. So the House refused to order a call of the House.

The previous question was now put and carried.

And the main question being on Mr. FILLMORE's motion to reconsider—

It was decided in the negative, as follows—yeas 78, nays 96.

So the House refused to reconsider the order by which certain additional testimony in the New Jersey case had been referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. FILLMORE said it had been suggested to him by several of his friends that the member from Ohio had imputed improper conduct to him before the committee, and had thrown out the idea that he (Mr. F.) was the individual who presented the sealed testimony. Now, all he wished was for the member from Ohio to state whether he intended to be so understood or not.

Mr. MEDILL said that when he had previously addressed the House, he was prevented from giving a full statement of the circumstances precisely as they occurred, owing to his being arrested by the member from Connecticut, [Mr. SMITH,] and compelled, under the resolution of the House, to speak of them as supposed cases. He would now, however, state that the facts in the supposed case existed precisely as he had stated them. A member of the committee produced, from his own pocket, a sealed envelope, purporting to contain testimony in relation to the New Jersey election, and directed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives. That member, on producing it, demanded that the papers it contained should be read. This was before the committee submitted their report to the House, but after it had been prepared. In speaking of the member, however, he did not say it was the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FILLMORE,] nor did he wish to be understood as alluding to him. It was the member from Connecticut, [Mr. SMITH,] the same gentleman who called him to order for referring to what took place before the committee. But he was of opinion that the gentleman from New York had joined in desiring that the papers should be opened and read.

The SPEAKER, in reply to a question from a member, here stated, that the papers in question were delivered to him by Mr. CAMPBELL, the chairman of the committee; they were enclosed in a sealed envelope, and were directed to him as SPEAKER. That was the first time he ever saw them.

Mr. TURNEY said he would like to know from the chairman of the committee how and in what way he came in possession of them.

[Here a scene of great confusion arose, many members attempting to speak at once, and which rendered it impossible for the Reporter to hear with distinctness.]

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut having with some difficulty obtained the floor, said that he had not called the gentleman from Ohio to order for alluding to any thing personal to him as a member of the committee, but on the ground that, under the resolution of the House, it was out of order to refer to the proceedings of the committee. With respect to the suggestion that some member of the committee had held very improper communication with one of the parties, (claimants,) he knew very well that the gentleman alluded to him. He knew that he was the person alluded to, because it was himself who delivered the testimony to the chairman of the committee, and the gentleman, if so disposed, might make as much of that fact as he pleased.

On this admission, there was some laughter from various parts of the hall.

Mr. S. said that if gentlemen supposed what he had said implied any conscious guilt, they were much mistaken; but if they chose to laugh, they could do as they pleased.

Mr. S. then went on to remark, what he considered a singular circumstance. He said that while the gentleman from Ohio had been denouncing the alleged improper communication with one of the parties, he had acknowledged that he himself had been holding such a communication. The denunciation was all on one side. When the gentleman rises and throws imputations on others, he, at the same time, tells the House that he has letters from one of the parties, informing him of what was going on.

Mr. S. went on to state, the depositions in question were sent to this city, under cover, to the Hon. Mr. OSBORNE, and under the envelope there was a letter directed to him, Mr. S. and which any member might read. The letter was of a political character, and merely mentioned that the depositions forwarded had reference to the illegal votes. The superscription on the envelope, containing the testimony, was "To the Speaker of the House of Representatives, care of the Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL: depositions on the New Jersey case."

Mr. S. said that, at the request of Mr. OSBORNE, he took the paper, and gave it to the chairman of the committee, supposing that as the committee had power to send for persons and papers, he had a right to open it. He, Mr. S. had been merely the instrument of taking it from his room and giving it to the chairman of the committee. There was nothing in the whole thing which could cast the least imputation on him. Mr. S. concluded by complaining that the previous question had been moved before time had been given him to make the above explanation.

Mr. MEDILL said, that, so far as the gentleman's explanation had represented him as acknowledging when up, "that he himself had been holding a communication with the parties," or either of them, it was wholly untrue. He had made no such admission or acknowledgment. What he had said was, that he had been shown a letter received by an individual in this city, and which then lay before him, confirming the suspicions that he had previously expressed in relation to the imperfect nature of the testimony in question, and the injustice that might have resulted from its consideration. These suspicions were freely expressed in the committee room, and in presence of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH] himself. He was taken by no surprise on this floor, he very properly acknowledges. He (Mr. M.) had held no communication with either of the parties, nor would he consent to consider any testimony not received through the ordinary channels prescribed by law and the rules of this House, unless the party whose rights were affected, had first an opportunity of being heard. He had never intended to refer to the matter on this floor, but had been driven to it by the unjustifiable attack of the gentlemen from New York, [Mr. FILLMORE.]

Mr. CAMPBELL asked leave to introduce a resolution that the journal of the committee and all the papers in its possession, in relation to the New Jersey contested election, be printed for the use of the House. What had passed to-day in the House rendered, he thought, such a measure proper, and almost necessary.

Objections being made by Mr. RICE GARLAND, and several others,

Mr. CAMPBELL moved to suspend the rules to enable him to make such a motion.

[The noise was very great, and the CHAIR arrested the proceedings until order could be in some degree restored.]

Mr. FILLMORE expressed his desire that such an order should be passed.

Mr. CRABB explained on the subject of the introduction of the bundle of papers into the committee.

A member objected to Mr. CAMPBELL's motion being received, as the floor had been yielded to Mr. PETRIKIN only for explanation.

The CHAIR decided the motion of Mr. CAMPBELL to be out of order, and declared the subject before the House to be the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections, made on the 5th instant, on the New Jersey election.

The questions pending being Mr. FILLMORE's proposition to recommit—

Mr. PETRIKIN's motion to amend Mr. FILLMORE's proposition—

And the question immediately pending being the demand heretofore made by Mr. PETRIKIN for the previous question—

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to adjourn.

Mr. CAMPBELL claimed the floor to explain. [Confusion and loud cries of order.]

The House refused leave for any more explanations.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON withdrew his motion for adjournment.

Mr. CAMPBELL again attempted to explain.

Mr. TURNEY objected.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved an adjournment; but the motion was negatived by yeas and nays—yeas 50, nays 135.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. CURTIS said that, as he believed the morning hour had expired, (viz. that allotted to reports and resolutions,) he demanded the orders of the day, (viz. private bills.)

The CHAIR replied that the hour had not quite expired.

Mr. PROFFIT moved a call of the House.

Mr. STANLY demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. TURNEY inquired whether a majority of the House had power to refuse to go to the orders of the day?

The CHAIR replied that on ordinary days it had; but not on days set apart by rule for private bills and business.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved to adjourn.

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BELL wished, by general consent, to modify the language of a resolution moved by him, and agreed to by the House, in regard to the Winnebago treaty, on the ground that the language was thought to imply a want of decorum toward the Executive Department, though this had happened unintentionally, and through inadvertence.

Mr. TURNEY objected.

Mr. BELL moved to suspend the rules.

Mr. ADAMS made some remarks in support of Mr. BELL's request, and moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution had been adopted.

Mr. HOFFMAN moved an adjournment.

On which motion the yeas and nays being ordered, resulted as follows—yeas 89, nays 85.

So the House, between 7 and 8 o'clock, adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, March 9, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to a resolution of the 25th instant, as to the Five Per Cent. Fund of the State of Alabama; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Surgeon General in relation to sites for marine hospitals; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a message from the President, transmitting a correspondence with the Spanish Government, in relation to a reduction of tonnage duties on Spanish vessels; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

The CHAIR also submitted the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate:

In addition to information already communicated, in compliance with the resolutions of the Senate of the 17th January last, I think it proper to transmit to the Senate copies of two letters, with enclosures, since received from the Governor of Maine, and of a correspondence relative thereto between the Secretary of State and the British Minister.

M. VAN BUREN.

Washington, March 9, 1840.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Augusta, February 15, 1840.

His Excellency M. VAN BUREN,
President of the United States.

SIR: A communication from Mr. Fox, the British Minister, to Mr. Forsyth, Secretary of State, under date of January 26th, contains the following statement:

"It appears from accurate information now in possession of the undersigned, that the Governor of Maine, and, through him, the President and General Government of the United States, have been misinformed as to the facts. In the first place, no reinforcement has been marched to the British post at the Lake Temiscouta; the only change occurring there has been the relief of a detachment of her Majesty's 24th regiment, by a detachment of equal force of the 11th regiment; this force of one company being now stationed at the Temiscouta post, as it always has been, for the necessary purpose of protecting the stores and accommodations provided for the use of her Majesty's troops, who may be required, as heretofore, to march by that route to and from the provinces of Canada and New Brunswick. In the second place, it is not true, that the British authorities either have built, or are building, barracks on both sides of the St. Johns river, or at the mouth of the Madawaska river; no new barracks have in fact been built any where."

This statement has been read by the citizens of this State with the most profound astonishment. And however high may be the source from which it emanates, I must be permitted to say, in the language of that high functionary, that "it is not true;" though, in justice to him, I should add, that he has been misinformed. Though this State, in the vindication of her rights and maintenance of her interests, relative to her territorial boundary, from past experience, had no reason to expect any material admissions of the truth on the part of the British authorities, she was not prepared to meet such a positive and unqualified denial of facts as the foregoing exhibits, especially of facts so easily susceptible of proof. The "accuracy" of the information alleged to be in the possession of the Minister, is only equalled by the justice of the pretensions heretofore set up in regard to title.

But, not to be bandying assertions where proof is abundant, I deem it my duty to transmit to your Excellency the depositions of a number of gentlemen, citizens of this State, of great respectability, and whose statements are entitled to the most implicit confidence.

These depositions abundantly prove, that up to May last, nearly two months subsequent to the arrangement entered into through the mediation of General Scott, no troops whatever were stationed at Temiscouta lake: that in August, September, and October, the number did not exceed twenty-five; while now it has been increased to about two hundred: that, prior to May, no barracks had been erected at Temiscouta; but that, since that time, two have been built at the head of the lake, besides some five or six other buildings apparently adapted to the establishment of a permanent military post, and, at the foot of the lake, two or more buildings for barracks and other military purposes: that, though no new barracks have been erected at Madawaska, certain buildings, heretofore erected, have been engaged for use as such: that a road has been constructed, connecting the military post at the head and foot of the lake—a tow path made the whole length of the Madawaska river—the road from the head of the lake to the military post at the river Des Loup thoroughly repaired—transport boats built, &c. &c

I would further inform your Excellency that an agent has been despatched to Temiscouta and Madawaska for the purpose of procuring exact information of the state of things there at the present moment; but having incidentally found some evidence of the state of things prior to November last, I have thought best to forward it without delay for the purpose of disabusing the Government and the country of the errors into which they may have been led by the communication before alluded to. The report of the agent will be transmitted as soon as received, which may not be short of two weeks.

Under these circumstances, I have only to repeat my official call upon the General Government for the protection of this State from invasion.

I have the honor to be, with great respect,
Your Excellency's most obedient servant,
JOHN FAIRFIELD,
Governor of Maine.

To his Excellency Hon. JOHN FAIRFIELD,
Governor of Maine.

The undersigned has the honor to report that, in accordance with your commission of the 6th instant, he proceeded immediately to the St. John's river, Temiscouata lake, &c. and ascertained by actual observation the following facts:

That twenty-two miles below the mouth of Fish river, on the south side of the St. John's, and nearly opposite the Madawaska river, a house has been fitted up for barracks, and is rented by the English Government for that purpose, though no troops are there at present. It is built of hewn timber, two stories high, about sixty feet long and thirty wide. It has bunks prepared for over one hundred men. It is now in charge of one man only. From thence he followed up the Madawaska river, observing the tow path on its east bank, which has been made and repaired by the English Government, under contracts given out by James A. MacLauchlan, esq. of New Brunswick, the gentleman who has heretofore assumed to act as Warden of the disputed territory. This work was accomplished the past season; the length corresponds with that of the east side of the Madawaska river, which is about twenty-six miles long.

Two miles and a half below the foot of the Temiscouata lake, on the west bank of the Madawaska river, the English erected, early last summer, a barrack, about eighty feet long and thirty wide, and two small out buildings. At this post, there are now stationed one sergeant, one corporal, and five private soldiers of company No. 3, 11th regiment in the English service, where they have been since about the first of January last.

Near this point commences a road, connecting it with the English works next described, built the past season under contracts given out by said MacLaughlan, for the distance of sixteen miles, ten of which are fully completed, and the remaining six nearly. That fifteen miles from the foot of Temiscouata lake, on its west side, the English have erected eight buildings as barracks for soldiers, officers' quarters, a hospital, a magazine, a storehouse, and a commissary's house, all of which are surrounded by ditches, breastworks, and stockades, on three sides; the fourth is not fully completed. An accurate plan of all these works accompanies this report, and is here particularly referred to.

From Major Chambri, the commander at this fort, who was first informed of the object and cause of the inquiries, and from his officers, the following facts were ascertained: That he was there stationed by the Government of the Canadas, having, under his command, one company of grenadier soldiers, numbering about eighty-five men, of the 11th regiment, and one light company, the third of same regiment, numbering about ninety men, in all one hundred and seventy five, not including officers commissioned, or servants. The names of the officers are Maj. Chambri, Capt. Wallington, Lieuts. Bloss and Gould, and Ensign Tolun. That the barracks were commenced last spring, and some of the buildings are still unfinished. That the first soldiers were stationed here in June last, comprising a sergeant, corporal, and ten men of 24th regiment; and in November following said company of grenadiers were ordered to take their place, and that about the first of January last they were reinforced by said third company. That the road from these barracks, to the river Des Loup, has been made and repaired the past season, distance about thirty-six miles.

In addition, the undersigned ascertained that the English have built, at Lake Temiscouata, a number of large flat bottom boats, and also keel boats, each of which will serve to carry fifty men, and the flat bottom boats would transport, safely, heavy ordnance. Outside the defences the English have a boat and store house.

The works at this fort are calculated to be a sure defence against artillery and light arms, as will more fully appear from plan annexed.

All of which is most respectfully submitted

BENJAMIN WIGGIN.

AUGUSTA, Me. Feb. 27, 1840.

STATE OF MAINE—SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Augusta, Feb. 27, 1840.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the original deposited in this office.

Attest, PHILIP C. JOHNSON,
Secretary of State.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 6, 1840.

By the directions of the President, the undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, communicates to Mr. Fox, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Great Britain, the enclosed copy of a report made to the Governor of the State of Maine, by the agent, commissioned on the part of the authorities of that State, to ascertain the precise character and extent of the occupation of parts of the disputed territory by troops of her Britannic Majesty, and of the buildings and other public works constructed for their use and accommodation.

By that report, and the three depositions which the undersigned informally communicated to Mr. Fox a few days since, he will perceive that there must be some extraordinary misapprehension on his part of the facts in relation to the occupation by British troops of portions of the disputed territory. The statements contained in these documents, and that given by Mr. Fox, in his note of the 20th of January last, exhibit a striking discrepancy as to the number of troops now in the territory, as compared with those who were in it when the arrangement between Governor Fairfield and Lieutenant Governor Harvey was agreed upon; and also as to the present and former state of the buildings there. The extensive accommodations prepared and preparing, at an old and at new stations, the works finished, and in the course of construction, on the land and on the water, are not in harmony with the assurance the only object is the preservation of a few unimportant buildings and store houses for the temporary protection of the number of troops her Majesty's ordinary service can require to pass on the road from New Brunswick to Canada.

The undersigned will abstain from any remarks upon these contradictory statements, until Mr. Fox shall have had an opportunity to obtain the means of fully explaining them. How essential it is, that this should be promptly done, and that the steps necessary to a faithful observance on the part of her Majesty's colonial authorities of the existing agreements between the two Governments should be immediately taken, Mr. Fox cannot fail fully to understand.

The undersigned avails himself of the occasion to renew to Mr. Fox assurances of his high consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth.

WASSHINGTON, March 7, 1840.

The undersigned, her Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the official note of yesterday's date, addressed to him by Mr. Forsyth, Secretary of State of the United States, to which is annexed the copy of a report from Mr. Benjamin Wiggin, an agent employed by the State of Maine to visit the British military post at Lake Temiscouta; and in which reference is made to other papers upon the same subject, which were informally communicated to the undersigned by Mr. Forsyth a few days before; and the attention of the undersigned is called by Mr. Forsyth to different points upon which the information contained in the said papers is considered to be materially at variance with that which was conveyed to the United States Government by the undersigned in his official note of the 26th of last January.

The undersigned had already been made acquainted, by the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, with the circumstance of Mr. Wiggin's visit to the military post at Lake Temiscouta, where the officer in command very properly furnished to Mr. Wiggin the requisite information upon all matters connected with the British station, which he appeared desirous to inquire about.

The alleged points of variance, after deducting what is fanciful and conjectural in the reports now produced, and after comparing what is there stated in contradiction to other reports before produced from the same quarters, do not appear to the undersigned to be by any means so material as they seem to have been considered by the Government of the United States. The British military detachment stationed at Lake Temiscouta, which the agents employed by the State of Maine had, in the first instance, with singular exaggeration, represented as amounting to two regiments, is now discovered by the same parties to amount to one hundred and seventy-five men, which, instead of two regiments, is something less than two companies. It is indeed true, should such a point be considered worth discussing, that the undersigned might have used a more technically correct expression in his note of the 26th of January, if he had stated the detachment in question to consist of from one to two companies, instead of stating it to consist of one company. But a detachment of her Majesty's troops has been stationed at the lake Temiscouata, from time to time, ever since the winter of 1837 and '38, when the necessity arose from marching reinforcements by that route from New Brunswick to Canada; and it will be remembered that a temporary right of using that route for the same purpose, was expressly reserved to Great Britain in the provisional agreement entered into at the beginning of last year.

It is not therefore true that the stationing a military force at the lake Temiscouta is a new measure on the part of her Majesty's authorities. Neither is it true that that measure has been adopted for other purposes than to maintain the security of the customary line of communication, and to protect the buildings, stores, and accommodations provided for the use of Her Majesty's troops when on a march by that route; and it was with a view to correct misapprehensions which appeared to exist upon these points, and thus to do away with one needless occasion of dispute, that the undersigned conveyed to the United States Government the information contained in his note of the 26th of January.

With regard again to the construction of barracks and other buildings, and the preserving them in an efficient state of repair and defence, a similar degree of error and misapprehension appears still to prevail in the minds of the American authorities.

The erection of those buildings within the portion of the disputed territory now referred to, for the shelter of her Majesty's troops while on their march, and for the safe lodgment of the stores, is no new act on the part of her Majesty's authorities. The buildings in question have been in the course of construction from a period antecedent to the provision agreements of last year, and they are now maintained and occupied along the line of march, with a view to the same objects above specified, for which the small detachments of troops also referred to, are in like manner there stationed.

The undersigned will not refrain from here remarking upon one point of comparison exhibited in the present controversy. It is admitted by the United States authorities that the armed bands stationed by the Government of Maine in the neighborhood of the Aroostook river, have fortified those stations with artillery; and it is now objected as matter of complaint against the British authorities, with reference to the buildings at Lake Temiscouata, not that those buildings are furnished with artillery, but only that they are defended by palisades capable of resisting artillery. It would be difficult to adduce stronger evidence of the acts on the one side being those of aggression, and on the other of defence.

The fact, shortly, is, and this is the assential point of the argument, that her Majesty's authorities have not as yet altered their state of preparation, or strengthened their military means within the disputed territory, with a view to settling the question of the boundary, although the attitude assumed by the State of Maine with reference to that question, would be a clear justification of such measures; and it is much to be apprehended that the adoption of such measures will sooner or later become indispensable, if the people of Maine be not compelled to desist from the extensive system of armed aggression which they are continuing to carry on in other parts of the same disputed territory.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew the Secretary of State of the United States the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

H. S. FOX.

The documents having been read:

Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Senate in justification of himself, as well as the Governor of Maine, for having declared that a portion of that State was occupied by British troops, and that the British authorities had erected barracks and military works upon the disputed territory; which statements had been denied by Mr. Fox's letter to Mr. Forsyth of the 24th of January last.

Upon the call of the Senate, (said Mr. W.) the President communited the correspondence between this Government and Great Britain, and also all the correspondence which had been had since the last session of Congress with the Governor of Maine and the British Minister at Washington, relative to the Northeastern boundary, and the jurisdiction of the disputed territory. This was done on the 22d of January last, and embraced the able and significant reply of Mr. Forsyth of the 16th of January, to the note of Mr. Fox of the 12th of January last, declaring "that a persistance in, or a repetition of, such acts, on the part of her Majesty's agents, as those now complained of, would, if avowed by Great Britain, be considered as but little in accordance with those (Mr. Fox's amicable) assurances."

The message and documents were immediately printed and widely circulated throughout the country, producing a deep sensation on the public mind. On the 24th of January, Mr. Fox addressed another note to Mr. Forsyth, saying, among other things, that "since the date of his last official note of the 12th instant, he has been furnished by her Majesty's authorities in North America with more correct information than he then possessed, respecting certain reported movements of British troops within the disputed territory, &c." and adding, that "it appears from accurate information now in the possession of the undersigned, that the Governor of Maine, and, through him, the President and General Government of the United States, have been misinformed as to the facts. In the first place, no reinforcement has been marched to the British post at the Lake Temiscouata; the only change occurring there has been the relief of a detachment of her Majesty's 24th regiment by a detachment of equal force of the 11th regiment; this force of one company being now stationed at the Temiscouata post, as it always has been, for the necessary purpose of protecting the stores and accommodations provided for the use of her Majesty's troops who may be required, as heretofore, to march by that route to and from the provinces of Canada and New Brunswick. In the second place, it is not true that the British authorities either have built, or are building, barracks on both sides the St. Johns river, or at the mouth of the Madawaska river; no new barracks have in fact been built any where," &c. to which Mr. Forsyth replied on the 28th of January; and on the 29th of that month, the President transmitted both letters, with his message, to the Senate, which were printed and extensively circulated through the country. You may well suppose, said Mr. W. with what astonishment I listened to such assertions from the official organ of her Britannic Majesty! Although perfectly satisfied that the statements of Governor Fairfield were substantially correct, I could not but be sensible that the letter of Mr. Fox was well calculated to throw suspicion on those statements, and to create a belief that Governor Fairfield had mistaken and misrepresented the true state of the case. I regret that he has been obliged to lay under this imputation so long, but am now rejoiced that the President has done justice to the Governor of Maine, as well as to the nation, by voluntarily communicating the evidence which has been furnished to him, and which has now been read to the Senate, fully establishing, as it does, the correctness of the statements made by Governor Fairfield, and showing the entire want of accuracy in the allegations in the British Minister's note of the 24th of January. Let us see what Mr. Fox declares, in that note, "appears from the accurate information then in his possession." In the first place, (said Mr. W.) he asserts "that no reinforcement has been marched to the Lake Temiscouata." The evidence is, that the 3d light company of 10th regiment, numbering ninety men, was marched to that post about the first of January last, as a reinforcement to the grenadiers then there. In the second place, Mr. Fox says, "the only change occurring there has been the relief of a detachment of her Majesty's 24th regiment by a detachment of equal force of the 11th regiment" The evidence is, that, in November last, there was at that post a sergeant, corporal, and ten men only, who were then relieved by a company of grenadiers of 11th regiment, consisting of eighty-five men. In the third place, Mr. Fox states "that this force, of one company, being now stationed at the Temiscouata post, as it always has been," &c. The evidence is, that, prior to June last, there was no force there, and, until November, there was only a sergeant's guard. In the fourth place, Mr. Fox says "that it is not true, that the British authorities either have built or are building barracks on both sides of the St. Johns river, or at the mouth of the Madawaska river." The evidence is, that barracks, and other strong works, have been built at the foot and head of the lake on the north side of the St. Johns river, and that a large building of hewn timber on the south side of that river, and opposite the Madawaska river, has been hired, fitted up for barracks, and is now occupied by the British authorities for that purpose. In the fifth place, Mr. Fox asserts "that no new barracks have, in fact, been built any where." The evidence is, that new barracks have been built at the head and foot of the lakes.

But enough of this. The depositions of witnesses under oath, and the report of the agent sent by the authorities of Maine, for the special purpose of seeing the works and ascertaining the force of the British upon the disputed territory, will carry conviction to the mind of every one who will read them, and the nation will see and duly estimate the truth of the case.

Having said (continued Mr. W.) what I considered to be my duty to Governor Fairfield, the State of Maine, and myself, in reference to this extraordiuary letter of the British Minister, I would now ask the attention of the Senate to a more important view of the subject. By the arrangement entered into in March last between the Governor of Maine and the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, it was agreed that the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, without renewed instructions to that effect, would not seek to take military possession of the disputed territory, &c. In answer to Governor Fairfield's inquiry in December last, as to British troops being stationed within the diputed territory, Sir John Harvey says, "that whatever movements of troops may have taken place on the side of Lower Canada, have been made by authority superior to mine," &c. Is it possible that, after making an arrangement with the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick for the preservation of peace upon the borders, pending the negotiation on the subject of the boundary, we are now to be told that, while the Lieutenant Governor respects and conforms to his own arrangement, his superior may and will do as he pleases; and is to be permitted to construct strong posts and keep what military force he thinks proper upon the territory in dispute? Are we quietly to remain in a condition so humiliating? I trust not. And yet this is the position in which we are placed, if we accede to the views taken by Mr. Fox in his letter of 24th of January last, where, speaking of her Majesty's authorities in North America, he says: "they will, as at present advised, consult their own discretion, in adopting the measures of defence that may be rendered necessary by the threats of a violent interruption to the negotiation, which have been used by all parties in Maine," &c.

Here we have the avowal of the accredited Minister of he Britannic Majesty to this Government, that her Majesty's authorities in North America, (not the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, for he has made an agreement which forbids his doing it,) assuming, without the least foundation for such assumption, that Maine threatens, or desires, a violent interruption to the negotiation, will, as at present advised, consult their own discretion in adopting measures of defence; and we have the proof that, in the exercise of that discretion, those authorities have constructed strong military posts, stationed regular troops, and made roads for the transportation of men and military stores within the disputed territory, contrary to agreement, and in violation of the just rights of the State of Maine. Shall we, can we, submit to such usurpation? to such wrong? If there is a patriotic feeling in the bosom of any American, it will emphatically respond, no!

Mr. W. then alluded to the late message of Sir John Harvey to the Assembly of New Brunswick, in which he expresses great confidence that, upon the arrival in England of the commissioners who recently came out to examine the disputed territory, and upon their report being made to the Ministry at home, such a proposition would be made for the adjustment of the question of boundary as would be satisfactory to this Government. He does not intimate what that proposition will be, or how it will be made satisfactory, but the Assembly thereupon passed a bill to authorize Governor Harvey to raise a corps of twelve hundred men whenever it might become necessary. Our whole borders are being surrounded with military posts and fortifications; additional troops are being sent into the provinces; and soldiers and military works are placed within and upon a portion of the territory in dispute.

With such means upon our borders to render a proposition satisfactory, who can wonder that Sir John Harvey should feel great confidence that it would prove satisfactory? Would it not, under such circumstances, be wise to place our frontier in a condition which will enable us to consider and act upon any proposition which may be made to us with calmness and freedom from coercion? Is it not apparent, while this Government is resting in security, relying upon the strong and reiterated declarations of Great Britain of its anxious desire to bring the long pending controversy about our Northeastern boundary to an amicable and just termination, and conforming to the arrangements for preserving peace on the borders, that the British authorities are steadily and constantly preparing for a different result? Shall we be blind to the recent augmentation of troops in the provinces—to the construction of military posts upon our whole Eastern and Northern frontiers—to the making of roads for the speedy movement of troops and the erection of buildings for their accommodation? While Maine, deeply interested in the question of boundary, is looking with intense anxiety upon these extensive preparations for conflict, and is calling upon the General Government to fulfil the constitutional duty of protecting and defending her against foreign encroachment and dismemberment, what has the Government done? Has it come to her in that way which would have been most likely to preserve her rights and bring the question to a prompt termination? Is it now the duty of this Government forthwith to meet the recent movements of Great Britain by corresponding movements upon our part? Would not such a course promote the amicable and early settlement of the pending dispute? And by so doing, would not the hazzard of border conflicts be greatly diminished? These questions demand the serious and solemn consideration of Congress and the country. Maine does not desire, by any act of hers, to bring on a war, but she ought not, and cannot, suffer a portion of her territory long to remain in the military occupation of foreign troops.

Mr. W. then moved that five thousand extra copies of the message and documents be printed, and in order that the public might see and compare the statements of Mr. Fox, with the evidence now furnished, that the same number of the President's message of the 29th of January, together with Mr. Fox's letter of the 24th of January, and Mr. Forsyth's reply thereto, should also be printed with the present message and documents; which was agreed to.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a memorial from the Town Council of Georgetown, South Carolina, asking for the erection of a light-house at the mouth of the river Santee; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial, praying for the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STURGEON presented a memorial, praying for the imposition of a moderate duty on foreign silks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a petition from a number of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALL presented a similar petition; which had the same reference.

Mr. W. also presented additional papers in relation to the claim of John H. Mackintosh; which were filed with the bill for his relief.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented a memorial of stockholders of the Agricultural Bank of Natchez, for further indulgence in the payment of a sum due the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. C. also presented several memorials in favor of measures for the prevention of wars between nations; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BENTON presented a memorial from some good hard money men of Missouri, remonstrating against the present banking system; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. B. also presented a memorial of citizens of Missouri, praying the passage of a pre-emption law; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCE, from the Select Committee, to which was referred the memorial of Samuel Forry, made a special report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, accompanied by a bill, which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred a bill to revive the act entitled "An act to enable claimants to land within the limits of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas, to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims, &c. reported the same with an amendment; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of William Hogan, administrator of Michael Hogan; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill for the relief of Francis A. Harrison; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. NORVELL, the vote of the Senate adopting the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, adverse to the claim of was reconsidered, and the petition, with additional papers, was again referred to that committee.

The motion submitted some days since by Mr. BENTON to print ten thousand additional copies of the salt document, was taken up, and agreed to—ayes 23, nays 14.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Jean Baptiste Comeau; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. TALLMADGE submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reappropriating by law the balance of the appropriation of ten thousand dollars, heretofore made by Congress, to be distributed among the officers and crew of the late private armed brig "General Armstrong," which balance, amounting to $2,975 20, was carried to the surplus fund on the 31st December, 1839.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. LUMPKIN moved to take up the following resolution, submitted by him some days since, in relation to the adjournment of the two Houses of Congress:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives do adjourn their respective Houses sine die, on Monday, the —— day of May next.

Mr. LUMPKIN said this was a subject which did not require many words for its elucidation, as every Senator could judge of its propriety or impropriety. From the convictions of my own mind, said Mr. L. I am satisfied that if we agree to fix the adjournment two months hence, we can do more business, and do it better, than if we delay it till September next. Thirty years' reflection had convinced him that, when a definite day was fixed for the adjournment, the members applied themselves more assiduously to business; there was less talking and more action; and a general disposition to despatch the measures before the expiration of the time allotted had expired.

But there was another and an important consideration to be taken into account. Taking the expenses of the short sessions as data, we have been sitting here up to this day, at an expense to the nation of little short of half a million of dollars. And what have we done during this time? If my recollection is correct, Congress has passed but three bills—one of which was for the payment of themselves.

Another consideration, and, with him, a very important one, was that, on account of the long sessions, and the great difficulty of getting the business entrusted to them by their constituents transacted, Congress was lowered in the estimation of the country, which was a great public evil. Notwithstanding the great outcry about Executive abuses and Executive patronage, the Legislature is by far the most important branch of this Government. Whatever may be the amount of Executive abuses, they dwindle into insignificance, when compared with those which may spring from improper legislation. Whatever may be his designs, no Executive can materially injure this country, if Congress does its duty. The President only executes the laws; and if this is done improperly, Congress has the power of checking him; and has even the power of removing him from office.

In submitting this resolution, Mr. L. said, he had consulted no one on the subject; but he thought the interests of the country, and the character of Congress, required that they should adjourn at the earliest day the situation of the public business would permit. He would not occupy longer the time of the Senate, but wished to record his vote on the proposition. He would discharge his duty, and he presumed others would discharge what they conscientiously believed to be theirs.

Mr. L. then moved to fill the blank with the "18th day of May next;" which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, expressed himself decidedly in favor of the resolution, which had been introduced by the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr LUMPKIN.] He said he would not only cordially vote to adjourn the present session of Congress on the 18th of May next, but he would go still further, and would vote for an amendment of the Constitution, by which the first session of the term, as well as the last, should be limited to some definite period. He said it appeared to him that the tendency of things, for the last ten or twelve years, was toward a perpetual session of Congress, to which he was utterly oppposed. Mr. C. said it had become customary for Congress, at the first session in every term, to continue here seven or eight months, when a much shorter time was required for the despatch of the public business; and it was time to make a change.

Mr. C said it was a fact, easily demonstrable, that much the greater portion of the business was done, at every session, whether long or short, within the last few weeks. He said he had been an attentive observer of operations here for the last ten or eleven years; and such, as far as he recollected, had been uniformly the case. But (he said) he had just looked hastily into the proceedings of the last two sessions, and found this view of the matter fully sustained. The last session was a short one; but about two hundred and fifty acts and resolutions had been passed—the usual amount of business had been done. Yet, (said Mr. C.) up to the 6th of February, when more than two out of the three months of the session had elapsed, only five acts and one resolution had passed. The remaining two hundred and forty or fifty acts and resolutions had been passed within the last twenty-five days of the session. At the preceding session, which was the last long one, and continued from the first Monday in December to the 9th of July, about two hundred and seventy acts and resolutions had been passed; and, of that number, about one hundred and seventy passed within the last thirty days of the session.

Now, (said Mr. C.) I may not be precisely accurate—my calculation has been hastily made; but I do not believe I am far wrong: and what does it prove? It shows satisfactorily, to my mind, that about an equal amount of business is done in a session of three months that is done in a session of eight months—and the greater portion always within the last few weeks, at either session.

Mr. C. said he had also observed another fact in his experience here, and that was, that so soon as a day of adjournment was fixed, every one began to attend more assiduously, and manifested a stronger desire to despatch the business. He thought he might appeal with confidence to all who had served at former sessions, to sustain him in this view of the subject. Let it be once understood, on all hands, that there is to be an end of the session on the 18th of May, and we should see the members of both Houses prosecuting their duties with increased energy and alacrity. Assured, as he was, that the results would be altogether beneficial, Mr. C. expressed the hope that the resolution would receive the sanction of the Senate.

Mr CLAY of Kentucky took that occasion to express the pleasure he felt in finding such a measure emanate in the quarter it did. He not only had no objection to the time fixed in the resolution, but was ready to go still further, and vote for an adjournment to-morrow, ay, or even that very day; for, from the appearance of things around him, he must say, and he did so with the deepest regret and mortification, that nothing was to be expected from the present session of the present Congress, either to advance the interests, or to relieve the embarrassmentr of the people. The sooner, then, that they went home and mixed with their constituents, the better. Let us go to the honest farmer, and take a chaw tobacco with him, and ask him "how are his children—how the state of his crops, and what markets are afforded, in the present crippled state of the times, through the war made upon the banks and credit of the country;" and when we meet again, said Mr. C. it will be under happier auspices; we shall then be likely to find a Congress better organized, and more disposed to regard the public weal. The only objection he had to this measure was, that it was calculated to deceive and impose upon the people; he did not impute any such design to the Senator from Georgia; but that was its evident tendency. Who for one moment believed—did the honorable Senator himself believe—that the session would be closed by the middle of May next? No, sir, said Mr. C. the dog-days will still find us in this city, and I object only that the step is calculated to impress the people with the belief that such a step was seriously contemplated. The state of the finances was such as to require the issue of some four or five millions of Treasury notes, and, by the time we were ready to go, we might be called on for four or five millions more, and that alone would compel us to stay. He should vote for the resolution, convinced, as he was, that nothing would be done to improve the condition of the country; and the sooner, therefore, the adjournment took place, the better for the country and their friends.

Mr. LUMPKIN said the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] was not present when he introduced the resolution. He had then stated that it was the result of no consultation with any person, but was presented from his own convictions of duty. He had not stated that he anticipated that his resolution would pass, as he had no intention to deceive. He would even say he did not anticipate success, but he had so received his lessons in the school of duty, as, when convinced he was in its path, to sow his seed in the morning, and not withhold his hand in the evening. He would discharge what he conscientiously deemed to be his duty, regardless of consequences.

Mr. BENTON appreciated fully the motives which actuated the Senator from Georgia, in presenting this resolution. They were all laudable, and such as should actuate gentlemen in bringing forward public mensures. He had many years since been convinced of the evil resulting from the inequality of duration in the short and long sessions, and thought it would be of advantage to equalize them, by taking something from the end of the long, and adding something to the beginning of the short session. A bill, with a provision of this kind embraced in it, passed both branches of Congress a few years since, but was vetoed by the Executive, on the ground that we had no power to make a permanent law on the subject; that one Congress had no right to bind its successors, though each might legislate for itself. He was in favor of adjourning earlier and meeting earlier. By our present arrangement, gentlemen were generally on their way here during the first severe spell of cold weather, and were therefore exposed to its inclemencies, at the great risk of life and health. He had himself been more than once frozen up on the Ohio river, and compelled to prosecute his journey by land, over by-roads and in neighborhood conveyances. Business is also delayed by the present arrangement, as from the time at which we meet it has got to be a settled thing that no business is to be transacted until after Christmas. But he would suggest to the Senator from Georgia the propriety of holding up the resolution for a few days, that some consultation and assimilation of opinions might be had on the subject. There were now on our table three or four communications, and one special message from the President, upon the subject of an anticipated deficit in the Teeasury. The great diversity of opinion between the Executive and Judiciary in regard to the operation of certain provisions of the compromise act: the great increase of drawbacks, which have reached an enormous amount: the almost certainty that the debts owing to the Government by many of the banks—all were operating to produce a deficiency in the Treasury. The Bank of the United States will owe a large amount to the Government in September; but that institution will now not even pay out her own irredeemable rags to discharge her obligations. Checks drawn on her by depositors are not paid, but they merely stamp "good" on them—to which some add "for nothing." If the bills which were necessary to keep the Government in existence were in the power of the Senate, then he might be disposed to consider the propriety of fixing a day for adjournment; but he was not willing to see this Government crumble down into atoms for the want of means to carry it on, and he would give no vote which should put it into the power of those who were willing to see Congress adjourn to-day, (as Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he was,) and thereby leave the Government to dissolve; for the event is certain, that unless bills are passed to raise money, the Government must stop payment before the next session.

Mr. LUMPKIN concurred with the Senator last up in the propriety of many of his remarks; but in the proposition before them there was no hasty day fixed—there was abundance of time allowed to make up all matters alluded to by that Senator, and all other necessary business. He could not bring himself to indulge the idea that another branch would fail to do its duty when the day for closing the session was named. He had never been in the habit of speaking of party, or expressing party opinions, (that was for another place, not for the Senate of the United States;) but, having a majority, as his political friends had, in both branches of the National Legislature if they would not act, he was ready for the blame to rest on his side of the House. He was willing to go home to his constituents, as the Senator from Kentucky had suggested. They had a double duty to fulfil: one that pertained to Congress, and another to themselves. He felt desireus to bring the session to a close.

Mr. SEVIER was in favor of the resolution. He wished to go home to his constituents. So long as a limit was not fixed, the public business was not progressed in. During short sessions they had ample evidence that more was done in three months than usually in any six of the long ones. With regard to the wants of Government, he was willing to supply what it required—five, ten, nay twenty millions, if such a sum was necessary. He was not particular about that matter; but, if the public business was not attended to, he was for leaving the responsibility where it belonged. He coincided in the opinion that Congress was not the place for discussing the merits of candidates for public favor. They were sent here to transact business, and not to make speeches. Political discussions were more appropriate subjects for the stump, where gentlemen would have an opportunity of displaying themselves when they returned to their constituents.

Mr. HUBBARD wished to postpone the whole matter for the present. He would go as far as any man in his efforts so to dispose of the public business as to have an early adjournment. But look at the state of the public business. When all the important public bills passed by this body were sleeping on the Speaker's table, was that a time to move in this business? In fact, the other branch was not fairly organized. When that took place, he would be ready to go with his friend from Georgia in fixing some certain day. He would therefore move to postpone it until that day week.

This motion was negatived—ayes 19, noes 21.

Mr. ALLEN said I believe the condition of public affairs was never more critical than at present—never were more important measures, more difficult questions, grouped together and pressed at once upon the attention of Congress. We are assembled here, not as visiters, for a limited number of days, to enjoy, during the winter, the luxuries of the capital, and to retire, at the opening of spring, to the interior, as our taste or private convenience may suggest; no, but to transact those affairs with that circumspection and care becoming men charged with so solemn a trust. Whatever may be the reason of the fact, experience proves the fact to exist—that even in ordinary times, much less at a conjuncture like this, the period fixed in the pending resolution for the adjournment, has been found too short for the alternate sessions of Congress.

It has been declared a violation of order to speak here of the House of Representatives. Not so. It is, as it should be, out of order to allude disrespectfully to that body, or to any one of its members; not otherwise. Well, the resolution declares that the President of this, and the Speaker of the other, branch shall, on a given day, and that not distant, adjourn, finally, their respective Houses. The resolution is, therefore, a declaration of the Senate's opinion to the country—a declaration to be made now in advance, that the House of Representatives ought to transact all its business within a period named, not by the House itself, but by the Senate, and that period far short of the usual day of adjournment for the long session.

It is proposed to make this declaration, although it be a fact notorious, (of the reason I speak not,) that the House, so far from having acted definitely upon any one of the public measures, which are admitted to be not only indispensable to the general welfare, but some of them to the very life and being of the Government—that it is not yet, as to one of the States, even an organized body, prepared to act at all. Are we then, is it wise or just that we should, thus chide the House for its tardiness—thus prescribe, in advance, limits to its action—thus infer delinquency in that body, by proclaiming our own prompt fidelity to the public?

But how stand matters with the Senate itself? Where are the general appropriation bills? Where the revenue bills? Where the graduation, the pre-emption bills? Where that for the continuation of the Cumberland road? Have these been acted upon, even here? Have any one of them gone through the first stage to consummation? And are Senators prepared to hazard these measures, for the want of time, by fixing an adjournment so unusually near? Some of these bills must originate in the House, before acted upon here; and when, in the existing condition of things, can we expect them to come to the Senate? We sent to the House the bill for the defence of Florida, weeks ago, yet it still sleeps upon the table—so we sent, and so sleeps the Independent Treasury—as likewise others of less importance. If by any untoward event these measures be lost, where is the responsibility? It falls upon the majority—the friends of the Administration, if indeed they be a majority. For, sir, whosoever may, in fact, be the delinquents, the people will, and ought to, ascribe results to those who have the power to act, and to apportion responsibility by the standard of numbers. I say they ought, because such is the theory of our Government—and this the only effective compulsion on majorities to do their duty. This is true of bodies in the aggregate, although it is equally true that the justice of the people, in the separate States and districts, will hold their particular Representative likewise individually responsible, if among the delinquents, notwithstanding they are of the minority.

Again, the bank charters of this District expire, I believe, on the fourth of the coming July. They have applied to this body for a renewal—must be renewed this session, if at all, and as yet, have not been put through even the first process. Now, sir, come up when they will, as come up they must, they shall not, with my consent, be smuggled through the Senate without discussion, for want of time to discuss them. No; I am not now to learn the character of the great contest which, at this hour, so deeply convulses all parts of the country—a contest involving principles which must in future affect most sensibly, most vitally, the very form of this Government—the safety, the very existence of the Republic. Nor am I yet to learn that our example, in this particular, will exert upon that contest an influence, powerful for good or for evil.

Sir, my friend from Georgia, [Mr. LUMPKIN,] who introduced this resolution, and those Senators who support it, are unquestionably sincere in believing the time sufficient; they are incapable, I know, of being otherwise; but still I think with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] that, though the resolution may be passed, we shall nevertheless be found here engaged at the ordinary period of adjournment. And, if so, will it not seem, that, by thus fixing in advance a time so far short of that to which, in the end, we actually extend the session, we have been but sporting with the public credulity? I repeat, that I know Senators incapable of intending this; but it becomes the dignity—it is essential to the moral force of a legislative body, not only to act in good faith, with candor and sincerity in all things, but to appear so to act.

After all, in the condition of the public business, not the number of days, is the rule by which to determine the adjournment. We are sent here to do that business, nor will the people, if we adjourn and neglect it, excuse our delinquency, because we are quick to prove ourselves delinquent. They are just—they reason justly; and they will approve or condemn, according to the manner in which we spend the time, not to the time itself. Let us, therefore, work—faithfully work—and, being done, go home. Sir, I now speak sincerely my opinions, formed, as they are, alone in reference to the public welfare, and have a right to be thought sincere. For who has neglected his duties less—who been more steady to his post than I? So much so, indeed, that I do not now remember an entire day, or a single vote, I have lost since I became a member of the body—certainly no vote of importance. However hazardous may be the question, I neither dodge nor flee. Let us, then do the work and go home. There, I am as anxious to be as any other Senator. I move, therefore, to lay the whole subject upon the table.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, requested Mr. ALLEN to withdraw his motion to lay the resolution on the table, which precluded debate; which having been done,

Mr. C. inquired whether the Senator from Ohio intended certain remarks relating to "tricks," and "playing mountebank," to apply to him, or the course he had thought proper to pursue on this occasion.

Mr. ALLEN having disclaimed any such intended application.

Mr. C. expressed himself satisfied, and remarked that he had supposed the reasons he had before assigned, for supporting the resolution, were sufficient to exempt him from any such imputation. He said he had shown by reference to the last two sessions, that nearly all the business was done within the last thirty days of each; and that about the same number of laws were passed at the short session of three months, as at the long sessions, which had been for years growing longer and longer, until they occupied seven or eight months. This was sufficient to satisfy him, that the public business could be done within a more limited time; and, if so, it followed, that regarding economy, and the public interest, it ought to be done. Nor was he afraid of the responsibility of now fixing a definite period for the session, when it was manifest sufficient time would be allowed for the performance of all the necessary duties. He said if the public business was not done, the people of this country were sufficiently intelligent and discriminating to attach the blame to the proper party, or the individuals justly chargeable with delinquency.

But, Mr. C. said, he did not agree with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] in the reasons assigned by him for giving the resolution his support. That Senator had said he was willing to adjourn, because he did not expect we should do any good by remaining here, and that we should meet under more favorable auspices at the next session. Mr. C. said, however little prospect there might be of doing good by remaining in session, judging from indications thus far, there would be abundant time, as he had shown, for the transaction of all the necessary business, if the two Houses would do their duty; nor did he expect Congress would meet under very different auspices at the next session, than those of the last ten or twelve. He anticipated no change in the Administration; and experience had satisfied him that defeat did not change the character of the Opposition. He said he had been accustomed to hear these sanguine expressions of confidence in the future on former occasions, and they did not alarm him. About the same period in 1832, it was confidently predicted that we should have a change of rulers at the then succeeding session; yet General Jackson was re-elected by a most triumphant majority. Again in 1836 we were to be certainly defeated, and a Whig President was to come into power; Congress was to meet under new and better auspices; but the month of November put an end to all these fond anticipations, and the present Chief Magistrate was triumphantly elected. So, said Mr. C. will it be again in next November—he had too much confidence in the intelligence and and patriotism of the people to believe, for a moment, that any thing but another defeat awaited the Opposition, whatever confidence they might profess.

But, said Mr. C. we shall have the same opposition to encounter then, as now. Large as was the majority by which General Jackson was elected in 1828, he encountered the most determined opposition at the commencement, and throughout his first term. Though re-elected by a greatly increased majority, the opposition to his Administration continued with unabated violence, from the beginning to the end of his second term. And, Mr. C. said, it would be recollected by all, that the present Chief Magistrate was met by his enemies at the extra session—the first after his election—and they had pursued him with untiring perseverance and the most bitter denunciations ever since. And so, Mr. C. said, it would ever continue, while those who were out were desirous to get in.

Mr. ALLEN then renewed his motion to lay the resolution on the table, which was negatived—ayes 19, nays 23.

Mr. KING said he was as much in favor of early adjournment as any other gentleman could be. He had many personal inducements to desire it. When the session was protracted far into the summer, the sickly season had commenced in the section of country where he resided, and forbade his return until it had terminated, and hence his anxiety for an early adjournment might be inferred; but he thought the state of the public business absolutely forbade them to move hastily in a measure of so much importance. It was true that, in short sessions, more business was done, in proportion to the time, than in long ones; but this was accounted for to some extent, by the fact that in the House, the business matured during the long session was carried over. If a proper disposition was evinced in the other House, it might be prudent to fix a day; but could we shut our eyes on the condition of business there? and what had been sent to us from that branch? Under this state of the case, would it be expedient, or would it be acting discreetly, to fix the day at the period named? He would move its postponement until Monday next, when more time would be had for reflection and consultation, and he hoped that gentleman would accede to his motion.

Mr. LUMPKIN expressing his assent, the motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. KING, the bill regulating commercial intercourse with the port of Cayenne, in the colony of French Guiana, and to remit certain duties, was considered, and ordered to be engrossed.

ABOLITION OF IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL, the bill supplementary to the "act to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases," providing that such act shall be so construed as to abolish imprisonment for debt, or process issuing out of any court of the United States, in all cases whatever, where, by the laws of any State, imprisonment for debt has been, or shall hereafter be, abolished," was taken up.

Mr. NORVELL said that the act to which this bill was a supplement, had abolished imprisonment for debt, or process issuing out of the federal courts, only in those States where, at the passage of the law in February, 1839, their laws had abolished it. Such was the construction put upon it by at least one of the courts; and a letter from a judge of the Supreme Court, received by him, stated that to be the proper construction, according to the uniform decisions of that high tribunal in similar cases. He hoped, therefore, the bill would be permitted to pass, by the indulgence of the Senate, to a third reading at this time.

The bill was accordingly ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Madame De Lusser, and their legal representatives, was ordered to be engrossed.

On motion by Mr. WRIGHT, the bill more effectually to secure public money in the hands of officers and agents of the Government, and to punish public defaulters, was taken up, and made the order of the day for Tuesday, the 10th inst.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 9, 1840.

After the reading of the journal,

Mr. ADAMS said he did not discover, from the reading of the record, that the motion he had made to reconsider the resolution offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] to suspend the operation of the treaty with the Winnebago Indians, had been entered. His object was to make the alteration in the resolution which the gentleman from Tennessee had indicated he wished to make. The resolution, in its present form, directs the Secretary of War to do that which the House had no power to direct him to. He would have no objection to the resolution, as it was proposed to be amended; but in its present form, he believed it to be unconstitutional. Inasmuch as his motion was not entered on the journal, he would now move to reconsider the vote on its adoption.

The question was then taken on the motion to reconsider, and it was agreed to.

The resolution as originally adopted was read, for which see the proceedings of Saturday.

The resolution, at the suggestion of Mr. ADAMS, was then so amended as to read as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient that all further proceedings in the execution of first and second provisions of the 4th article of the treaty of the 1st of November, 1837, with the Winnebago Indians, be suspended, and that, in the meantime, the Secretary of War communicate to the House the proceedings of the Department had upon the subject, since the adjournment of the last Congress, together with all the correspondence and other information within his control, relative to the same, not included in his communication to the House of Representatives on the 1st of March last.

Mr. SMITH of Maine said he would like to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs some reasons showing the necessity of the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BELL was understood to say that the subject of this treaty was before the committee, and under consideration, and that it had not been fully examined into. He believed there ought to be an inquiry into the whole subject before the treaty is executed, because there were some suspicions of fraud. The committee had not yet, as far as the examination has progressed, discovered frauds, but they saw enough to warrant them in asserting that the inquiry should be prosecuted further.

The question was then taken on the resolution as amended, and it was agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, chairman of the Committee of Elections, asked the consent of the House to make a report from the said committee in relation to the New Jersey contest, for the purpose of having the same printed. The report, he said, embraced all the testimony laid before the committee, prior to the 5th of March, the time at which the previous report on the same subject was made, and was accompanied by the journal of proceedings of the committee. As it contained all the papers, he hoped there would be no objection to the reception of the report.

Mr. STANLY objected to its reception.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to present the report, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 95, nays 77, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, John Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Crabb, Craig, Dana, John Davis, John W. Davis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Galbraith, Gerry, Goggin, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hillen, Holleman, Hook, Howard, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Kemble, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lucas, McClellan, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montgomery, Newhard, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Petrikin, Pickens, Prentiss, Reynolds, Rives, Robinson, Edward Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweeny, Taylor, Philip F. Thomas, J. Thompson, Triplett, Turney, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, and Henry Williams—96.

NAYS—Messrs. Alford, Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Bond, Botts, Brockway, Calhoun, W. B. Campbell, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, J. Cooper, M. A. Cooper, Corwin Curtis, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dillett, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Rice Garland, Gentry, Goode, Granger, Graves, Green, Habersham, Hall, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Kempshall, King, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Nisbet, Osborne, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, John White, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Sherrod Williams—77.

So the rules were not suspended.

This being the day, under the rule, for the presentation of resolutions, the SPEAKER called the States for that purpose, commencing with the State of Kentucky. Resolutions were then presented, which will be found below.

Mr. GRAVES asked the consent of the House to take up the resolution offered by him on the 20th February last, (and published in the Globe on the 21st,) in relation to E. W. Robinson, proposing an inquiry as to the manner of his resignation, &c. Mr. G. wished to modify his resolution by the insertion of the word "January" in its proper place.

Mr. ADAMS wished the gentleman would further modify his resolution by striking out the word "corrupt;" it shocked his modesty.

Objection was here made by several to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. GRAVES was proceeding to reply to Mr. ADAMS by stating that he had no particular desire that the word "corrupt" should be retained, but

Mr. G. was here called to order from all parts of the House.

The SPEAKER said the consideration of the resolution was objected to, and it was not in order for the gentleman from Kentucky to debate it.

Mr. G. was again proceeding to reply to Mr. ADAMS, but was called to order by several.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is out of order, and will be pleased to take his seat.

Mr. GRAVES. The blackguards who called me to order were themselves out of order. He then took his seat.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia made an effort to call up a resolution previously offered by him, calling upon the Secretary of War for his opinion and for facts in relation to the claims of John C. Watson of Georgia. It was now before the committee for investigation, and it was important to the claim that the resolution should be adopted.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS objected. The committee which had charge of the subject could call on the Department and obtain all the information necessary. It was not usual to call for opinions from the Departments in relation to claims, but for facts.

Mr. RUSSELL presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of New York, in relation to the Sub-Treasury bill; which were laid over under the rule.

Mr. GRANGER gave notice of his intention to introduce a proposition to rescind the rule adopted this session, in relation to the subject of Abolition petitions.

Mr. CURTIS, in accordance with notice heretofore given, and on leave, introduced a bill supplementary to the act to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases, passed February, 1831; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAND, in accordance with notice heretofore given, and on leave, introduced a bill for the establishment of a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal all acts heretofore passed on that subject; which was read twice, when

Mr. HAND moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be printed.

Mr. HUNT objected to this reference, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Some conversation took place between Messrs. HUNT and HAND, as to the appropriate reference, but before the question was taken, and in consequence of debate arising, the subject was laid over under the rule.

Mr. EVERETT, by universal consent, presented several petitions, which were appropriately referred.

Mr. SMITH of Vermont, in accordance with notice heretofore given, asked leave to introduce a bill to repeal so much of the 2d section of the act of 1823 to alter and amend acts imposing duties on imports, so far as relates to the duty on salt.

Mr. STUART demanded the yeas and nays on the question to grant leave, but before they were ordered,

Mr. EVANS intimated his wish to debate the question; and it was laid over under the rule.

Mr. ADAMS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House the natural, political, and martial history of the bloodhounds, showing the peculiar fitness of that class of warriors to be the associates of the gallant army of the United States, specifying the nice discrimination of his scent between the blood of the freeman and the blood of the slave—between the blood of the armed warrior and that of women or children—between the blood of the black, white, and colored men—between the blood of savage Seminoles and that of the Anglo-Saxon pious Christian. Also, a statement of the number of bloodhounds and of their conductors, imported by this Government, or by the authorities of Florida, from the Island of Cuba, and the cost of that importation. Also, whether a further importation of the same heroic race into the State of Maine, to await the contingency of a contested Northeastern boundary question, is contemplated, or only to set an example to be followed by our possible adversary in the event of a conflict. Whether measures have been taken to secure exclusively to ourselves the employment of this auxiliary force, and whether he deems it expedient to extend to the said bloodhounds and their posterity the benefits of the pension laws.

Mr. BOYD demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution; which were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS said, inasmuch as the yeas and nays were ordered, he would wish to explain before the question was taken.

The resolution, in consequence, was laid over under the rule.

Mr. CUSHING gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill imposing a duty on all silks, and for an increased duty on wines.

Mr. LOWELL, in accordance with notice heretofore given, and on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Robert Ramsay; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RIVES submitted the following, which lies over:

Whereas, by the Constitution of the United States, it is provided "that the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States;" and, whereas, by the laws of New Jersey, it is made the duty of "the Governor, or person administering the Government and Privy Council of that State, to determine the six persons who have the greatest number of votes from the whole State for Representatives in Congress of the United States; which six persons the Governor, or person administering the Government, shall forthwith commission, under the great seal of the State, to represent that State in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States; and whereas it has been charged that the Governor of New Jersey did, in violation of the Constitution of the United States, the laws of his own State, and one of the most important political rights of the people over whom he was presiding, commission five persons to represent said people, when he knew that five other persons had received a majority of the whole number of votes cast in the last election of members of Congress, and thereby rendering it necessary for the House of Representative to "judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications" of the persons thus returned as Representatives aforesaid; and whereas on an examination of the evidence to sustain the charges aforesaid, it appears that the Governor aforesaid did, in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States, and the laws of his own State, arrogate to himself the right to commission persons as members of Congress who were not "chosen by the people," and imperiously says, "whether my decision in granting the certificates was right or wrong, Congress, at all events, is bound to receive the credentials thus furnished, as the mandate of the State," although the same was founded in fraud, and designed to effect an organization of this House opposed to the popular will. And whereas, by the lawless "and unprecedented" act of the aforesaid Governor, the people of New Jersey have been deprived of their right to representation on this floor—"a right inestimable to them, and hateful to tyrants only." And whereas the election of members to represent the State of New Jersey in the House of Representatives of the United States belongs to the people of that State, and it is the duty of this House to protect them in their legitimate and constitutional rights in that particular against invasion and usurpation, from whatever quarter it may come. And whereas this House alone has power to remove the grievance complained of, and the morning hour allotted to the consideration of that business being insufficient to complete the same as speedily as is desirable.

Resolved, That the report of the Committee of Elections, relating to the same, be made the special order of the day for to-morrow, at the hour of twelve o'clock, and to continue the special order of the day on every subsequent day, at the hour aforesaid, until the said report shall be disposed of.

Mr. R. GARLAND said he had a few weeks ago submitted a resolution in relation to supposed frauds practised on the Caddo Indians. He moved that the House take up and consider the same.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON objected.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 70, nays 69.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi, in accordance with notice heretofore given, and on leave, introduced a bill to regulate the fees of the clerks, marshals, and attorneys, in the northern and southern districts of Mississippi; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DOTY gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce bills of the following titles, viz:

A bill concerning the Southern boundary of Wisconsin;

A bill to provide for the construction of harbors in Wisconsin; and

A bill to continue the duty on lead imported into the United States.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Iowa gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to authorize the President to cause certain mineral lands to be sold, and for other purposes.

Mr. G. DAVIS gave notice that he would, at a proper time, ask leave to bring in a bill to vest the appointment of the United States district attornies and marshals in the courts thereof; and providing the amount of salary and emoluments of district attorneys shall, in no case, exceed three thousand dollars.

Mr. EVERETT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, by permission, made an adverse report on the claim of John M. Baker; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

On motion of Mr. BANKS,

The House then adjourned.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. POPE submitted the following:

Resolved, That it is necessary and proper to establish a National Bank, with a capital of seventy millions of dollars, to aid the fiscal operations of the Government, revive the foreign and domestic trade and business of the country, restore public and private confidence and credit, put into active and brisk circulation the moneyed capital of the nation, and thereby invigorate all branches of business and industry, give employment to the laboring classes at fair wages in good money, relieve the people from the heavy burden of taxes now imposed on them by the present deranged condition of the exchanges and bank paper, reform the existing disorders in the currency, and secure to the nation a stable and uniform standard of value, by excluding a spurious and ruinous paper currency from circulation, and to prepare in part the pecuniary means of war; ten millions of the capital to be reserved for the United States; at least one half of the residue of the capital to be allotted to the States, and divided among them according to their representation in Congress, and the residue of the stock to be subscribed by American citizens and corporations, under proper rules and restrictions, who shall pay into the Treasury of the United States a premium of —— dollars on every hundred shares of stock subscribed; one or more branches to be established in each State now existing, or which may hereafter be admitted into the Union; the interests on loans by the bank not to exceed six per cent. for the first five years, and after the expiration of five years, the said bank is not to take more than five per cent.; no note to be issed by the bank of a less denomination than five dollars; after five years the bank shall not issue any note of a less denomination than ten dollars, and after the expiration of ten years the bank not to issue any note of a less denomination than twenty dollars. No foreigner shall be a director or vote for a director in said bank. Each State in which a branch shall be located shall have the appointment of one director in such branch, besides its due participation in the general election of directors. The deposites of the public money to be made in the said bank, to be disbursed as may be required and provided for. The bank, on reasonable notice, to lend to the Government any sum not exceeding ten millions without the consent of both parties. The bank never to suspend specie payments without the consent of Congress, and never to have notes in circulation exceeding twice the amount of specie in its vaults.

Resolved, That to aid the public credit and finances of the several States, and the better to enable them to take the proportion of bank stock allotted them in the first resolution, the proceeds of the public lands, to be received after the first day of January next, ought to be distributed among them according to the representation of each in Congress after the next apportionment of representation; one-half of the land fund paid to each State to be vested and pledged for the support of common schools, and the other half for internal improvements and such other purposes as the States respectively may direct.

Mr. STANLY moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. EVERETT made the question of consideration, and under that motion the resolution, according to a rule of the House, lies over.

Mr. HAND offered the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of document No 118, of the second session of the Twenty-sixth Congress, be reprinted for the use of the members of this House, including all the pension laws that shall be passed this session.

On motion of Mr. FLOYD,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting pensions to Wilmot Marsden and Lois Smith, widows of Revolutionary soldiers.

On motion of Mr. BREWSTER,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill allowing a drawback upon the exportation of flour manufactured from foreign wheat.

On motion of Mr. JONES of New York,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Ramapo, in the county of Rockland, State of New York, to New York city, in said county.

On motion of Mr. PRENTISS,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the extent to which the franking privilege is exercised by the Clerk of this House, at the request of members, in reference to political newspapers, and how such exercise of the franking privilege affects the revenue of the Post Office Department.

On motion of Mr. KEMBLE of New York,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be directed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Peekskill, in the county of Westchester, and State of New York, through the town of Putnam Valley, in Putnam county, of the same State.

On motion of Mr. GREEN of Kentucky,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Cloverport, Kentucky, to Bowling Green, in said State.

On motion of Mr. BOYD,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads examine and report upon the accounts of William R. Jenkins, late postmaster at Clinton, Kentucky, with the General Post Office Department.

On motion of Mr. ANDREWS,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the propriety of establishing a post road from Portsmouth, Ohio, to Springville, in Kentucky, so as to connect the Ohio mails from Maysville, Kentucky, to Big Sandy, Kentucky.

Mr. UNDERWOOD submitted the following, which lies over:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any and all joint resolutions prescribing the manner in which the printing of Congress shall be executed, fixing the prices thereof, and providing for the appointment of a printer or printers, shall be, and the same are hereby, rescinded; and henceforth the Senate and House of Representatives shall respectively provide for executing such printing as each House may require, by letting contracts to the lowest bidder, or in such manner as the Senate and House shall respectively think fit.

On motion of Mr. G. DAVIS of Kentucky,

Resolved, That the papers of the heirs of George Pursel, deceased, in relation to a pension, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, with directions to report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Hazel Green, in the county of Morgan, State of Kentucky, passing by the court-house of the county of Breathitt, Manchester, Clay county, Kentucky.

On motion of Mr. W. O. BUTLER,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the propriety of granting a pension to Catharine Shannon, widow of Robert Shannon, a soldier of the Revolution; also, to Diana Moore, widow of William Moore, a soldier of the Revolution; also, to Isabella Gulian, widow Jeremiah Gulian, a soldier of the Revolution; also, to Frances Green, widow of Robert Green, a Lieutenant of the Virginia line of the Revolution; also, the propriety of increasing the pension of William Merriweather, a Lieutenant of the Illinois regiment, who is now recovering pay as a sergeant only; and that the accompanying papers, and those on file in the Pension office, in support of said claims, repectively, be referred to said committee.

Mr. ALFORD submitted the following, which, causing debate, lies over, under the rule:

Resolved, That under an able and faithful administration of the Treasury Department of the General Goverement, it is competent to the fulfilment of the intention and design of the people of the United States, in the establishment of said Department, without the necessity of depending upon banks as places of deposite for the funds of the Government, or any other place or places of deposite, either of boxes or banks, or house or office, of any kind whatsoever, not now existing by law.

And be it further resolved, That it will be inexpedient at this time, or at any other time, to increase the patronage of the President of the United States, by establishing, by law, offices, in different parts of the country, to be filled by partisans, under the pretence that they are necessary to the better regulation of the monetary affairs of the Republic.

Resolved, That the Sub-Tseasury system recommended by the Federal Administration of the General Government is calculated to increase the patronage of the President, and to increase the distress of pecuniary embarrassment now suffered by the American people to a most ruinous extent.

On motion of Mr. MONTGOMERY,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill to authorize the State of Tennessee to perfect titles to the waste lands within the territory, inquire into, and report with said bill to this House, the provisions of the various acts of the States of North Carolina and Tennessee as to the claims of individuals in and to said lands.

On motion of Mr. DEBERRY,

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to Alexander H. Saunders, late a soldier of the army of the United States, such balance of pay as may appear to be justly due him from the evidence produced.

On motion of Mr. COLES,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act of 1808 as makes an annual appropration of two hundred thousand dollars for arming and equipping the militia of the United States.

On motion of Mr. SAMUELS,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Luney's Creek post office, in Hardy county, Virginia, by way of the valley of the North Fork, to Crab Bottom post office, in Pendleton county, Virginia.

On motion of Mr. J. GARLAND,

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing some mode by which to examine and test the authenticity of the returns and testimonials of the members of this House, before entering upon the discharge of their legislative duties; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. BANKS,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to this House such information as may be in his possession in relation to claims now pending before Congress, or which may be probably presented for damages sustained by individuals, growing out of the Florida war; and also all the information in his possession of the unsatisfied claims for provisions furnished the army, and for forage; and also to state if the existing laws do not provide an adequate remedy; and if so, why the claims thus depending have not been adjusted and paid by the proper accounting officers of the Government.

On motion of Mr. STEENROD,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing the following post routes, viz: From Brandonville, in Preston county, Virginia, via Morgantown, Granville, Jacksonville, Blacksville, in Monongahela county, to the city of Wheeling, in Ohio county; from Elizabethtown, in the county of Marshal, State of Virginia, via Noble Fork, to Middleburn, in the county of Tyler; from Middleburn, in the county of Tyler, to the Northwestern Turnpike, at Mr. Hoskins's; from Evansville, in Preston county, Virginia, to Morgantown, in the county of Monongahela, Virginia.

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS,

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire and report to this House whether any of its officers, and, if any, who are engaged, or in any wise concerned as agents for the prosecution of private claims against the Government; and also, whether any, and if any, what malpractices exist in the bestowal of the subordinate offices of the House, and whether there may not be a reduction in the number of persons employed therein, without prejudice to the business of the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. D. D. WAGENER,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to this House his plan, in detail, for the reorganization of the militia of the United States.

On motion of Mr. HENRY,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from the town of Mercer county, Pennsylvania, by the way of Greenfield, to the village of Middlesex in, said county, a distance of about sixteen miles.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing Charles Holmes, who enlisted in the army in January, 1811, and served throughout the war, a tract of bounty land.

On motion of Mr. HOOK,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the erection of guard fences on the Cumberland road east of the Ohio river, and of refunding to the commissioners of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, the sums advanced by them, out of the tolls received, for the completion of the tollhouse and tollgates on said road, and that House document No. 134, second session of Twenty-fifth Congress, be referred to said committee.

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be directed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to John Hooner, a Revolutionary soldier.

On motion of Mr. JENIFER,

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, such correspondence as may have been had upon the subject of the tobacco trade between the United States and foreign countries, together with such other information as may be on file in the Department in relation to the same, which may not be improper to communicate; also, to inform this House whether any, and what modifications have been made in the high duties and restrictions upon the staple of tobacco in foreign countries since the adoption of the resolution of the House of Representatives on that subject, of 28th February, 1837.

On motion of Mr. PETRIKIN,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to the sufferers at Wyoming valley, Pennsylvania, during the Revolutionary war, and their heirs, an indemnity in land to compensate them for their losses at that time and during said Revolutionary war.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting Andrew Loskey a pension for Revolutionary services.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post road between Newport and Juniata, in the county of Perry, State of Pennsylvania.

On motion of Mr. LEET,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a direct post route from Steubenville, in Ohio, via Eldersville, Cross Creek Village, to Washington, Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a new cross mail route from Cannonsburg, in Washington county, Pennsylvania, via Thompsonville, Bowerhill, Finleyville, and Muntown, to the Washington and Bedford turnpike road at McCullogh's Store.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a new mail route from Pittsburg, in Pennsylvania, to Morgantown, in Virginia.

Mr. SIMONTON submitted the following, which, under the rule, lies over:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act entitled "an act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled, in whole or in part, by steam," approved July 7, 1838, as that iron wire ropes or chains shall be employed and used in the navigation of all steam boats and steam vessels, instead of wheel or tiller ropes, as well those navigating rivers as lakes and seas.

On motion of Mr. D. D. WAGENER,

Resolved, That so much of the President's message as relates to the reorganization of the militia, be referred to the Committee on the Militia.

On motion of Mr. BREWSTER,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the propriety of allowing a pension to Penelope Plunket, on account of Revolutionary services rendered by her former husband, Joseph Davis.

On motion of Mr. J. SMITH,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reviving and continuing in force the provisions of the second section of an act passed March 3, 1817, entitled "An act to continue in force an act entitled an act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, passed the 3d day of March, 1815, and for other purposes."

On motion of Mr. CARR,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route, commencing at Canton, in Washington county, Indiana, thence to Sage's Ferry, on the Muscacalac, and thence to Rackford, in Jackson county, Indiana.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route, commencing at Paris, Jennings county, Indiana, thence to the State Ford, in Jackson county, thence via Little York, New Philadelphia, Canton, to Salem, in Washington county, Indiana.

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be intructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the service of the United States, approved January 18, 1827," so as to provide for the payment for horses and other property of the Rangers during the late war and since, raised by acts of Congress, lost while in the service of the United States, in cases where the loss sustained was not by any fault or negligence on the part of the owner.

On submitting the foregoing resolution, Mr. CARR remarked that, when the law of Congress passed in the year 1837, providing for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the service of the United States, that it was thought the law was broad enough to embrace the claims of the class named in his resolution, and in accordance to that understanding of the law many of the claimants forwarded their respective claims for horses, &c. lost whilst in the service of their country, to the proper officer of the War Department for adjustment, which officer was of opinion, and so decided, that the act of January 18, 1837, did not authorize him to pay the claims of the description named in the resolution. Mr. C. remarked that there was merit in the claims he proposed to provide for, and hoped there would be no objection made to them. His object was to make the law more clear and explicit in regard to the adjustment of those claims. There being no objection, his resolution was adopted.

Mr. WELLER submitted the following, which, under the rule, lies over:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to bring in a bill to prohibit the establishment of lottery offices and the vending of lottery tickets in said District.

On motion of Mr. JOHN DAVIS of Pennsylvania,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the pensions laws of the United States, as to include the widows and all officers and soldiers who have been killed, or who have died, or been disabled in the service of the United States in the late war with Great Britain.

On motion of Mr. BARNARD,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House the surveys and estimates of expense made by Captain Cram, or otherwise made under the orders of the Engineer or Topographical Bureau, for the construction of a harbor at Racine, in the Territory of Wisconsin, and for the construction of any other harbor or harbors on the western shore of Lake Michigan.

On motion of Mr. CHITTENDEN,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a new post road from Carthage, through Great Bend, Le Roysville, Evans's Mills, Shartyville, and Lafargeville, to Clayton, in the county of Jefferson, and State of New York.

Mr. MONROE offered the following; which, under the rule, lies over:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District for Columbia, be instructed to inquire into the propriety of reporting a bill to cause the Pennsylvania avenue to be lighted; and, also, to cause it to be watered during all or part of the spring or summer.

On motion of Mr. GATES,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pension of Mrs. Lydia Hoard; also of Jacob Jackson of New York.

On motion of Mr. HOFFMAN,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to this House copies of the correspondence on file in his office, between Admiral Baudin of the French Navy, and Commodore W. B. Shubrick of the United States Navy, Pensacola, during the months of June and July last.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the use of Greenough's chemical oil in the light-houses of the United States.

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to Mary Knapp, for the Revolutionary services of her husband, now deceased.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to S. and F. Dorr and Company, a return of duties alleged to have been illegally exacted by the late collector of New York, and paid by them upon the entry of sundry importations on silk twist.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Offices and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing, by law, the superintendent of common schools, or principal officer in any State having charge of its common schools, to transmit and receive by mail, free of postage, all official communications relating to the subject of primary education.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of fixing an earlier day for the meeting of the next session of the present Congress than that now provided by law.

On motion of Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of adding Memphis (Tennessee) as an additional point for erecting a Marine Hospital to the number already selected by the Board of Commissioners appointed by Congress to locate hospitals upon the Western waters.

Mr. MILLER offered the following resolutions, which lie over under the rule:

Whereas the obstruction or raft that has been formed by the deposite of floating timber, in the St. Francis river, in its course through the southeastern section of the State of Missouri, and the northeastern of that of the State of Arkansas, causes the annual overflow or inundation, by that river, of more, it is believed, than one million of acres of the most fertile and desirable lands in the West, if reclaimed; which lands are entirely owned by the General Government, but from those inundations the respective portions of the two States above mentioned are, to a great extent, rendered uninhabitable, and the healthiness of the country is greatly impaired thereby. Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be authorized, and he is hereby instructed, to cause an examination to be made, by a competent officer of the Engineer Department, in the course of the ensuing summer, and that he report to the next session of the Twenty-sixth Congress whether it be practicable to remove said raft or obstructions; and if, in his opinion, practicable, that he furnish also an estimate of the sum which it would probably require to effect such removal.

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be required to continue and report upon the expediency of making an adequate appropriation to enable the Secretary of War to carry the provisions of the foregoing resolution into effect.

Mr. DOTY offered the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House what measures have been adopted for the defence of the Northern frontier of the United States, on the Lake border and along the boundary between the United States, and the Indian tribes east of the Mississippi; whether many Indians are not removing from the American to the British territory; and new military works being constructed and garrisoned with regular and militia troops by the English Government on that frontier, and the numbers of each; what are the defences and force which the United States have opposed thereto, and where situated; and whether any further appropriations or provisions by law are required to be made by the erection of posts, the construction of steam frigates, the opening of military roads, or the formation of military settlements for the more effectual protection of the American territory against British or Indian invasion.

On motion of Mr. DOTY,

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of carrying into effect the resolution of Congress of the 3d of March, 1905, by which the President was requested to cause a sword to be presented to each of the commissioned officers and midshipmen, who distinguished themselves in the several attacks on the town batteries, and naval force of Tripoli, in the year 1804.

On motion of Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to inform this House what progress has been made in the settlement of the claims for horses lost during the late hostilities with the Creek and Seminole Indians in Alabama and Florida, by the Alabama volunteers, particularly those under the command of Colonel Caulfield, filed in 1837, and those under the command of Colonel Snodgrass, filed in 1838; also to inform this House what has caused the delay in the settlement of said claims.

On motion of Mr. R. GARLAND,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the reasons why a military post has not been established on or near the western boundary of the State of Louisiana, between the Sabine and Red rivers; and also all document, papers, and information in the Department in relation to the establishment of such post.

Mr. CUSHING submitted the following, which, under the rule, lies over:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested (if, in his opinion, compatible with the public interest) to communicate to the House any information in possession of the Government, respecting the assemblage of Indians on the Northwestern frontier, and especially as to the interference of the officers or agents of any foreign power with the Indians of the United States in the vicinity of the Great Lakes.

On motion of Mr. DAWSON,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested, as soon as he can conveniently, to lay before this House the claims of the State of Georgia against the United States, for payments made for military services rendered by the militia and volunteers of that State, during the Seminole, Cherokee, and Creek campaigns, during the years 1835, &c. and which said claims were presented for payment to the Secretary of War, by Iverson L. Harris, esq. during the year 1838; and that the Secretary accompany said claims with such views as he may deem due to the State, with the reason why said claims could not be paid, under existing laws.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN,

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to inform this House on what terms, and especially at what rent, the building now occupied for the accommodation of the city post office is hired by the Government; whether the same, or any part thereof, is, in any degree, fire-proof; or whether the building is not peculiarly exposed to the hazard of fire, from its proximity to structures of wood and large masses of combustible matter; what was the rent paid for the building from which the city post office was recently removed, and what the causes for such removal; and that he further state whether the plan upon which the building for the General Post Office is now being constructed, will admit of the convenient accommodation of the city post office; or if, when that building shall be completed, upon its present plan, it will continue to be necessary for the Government to hire, or to construct, a new edifice for the safety of the mails while remaining in the office, and the convenient transaction of the business in that branch of the service.

Mr. DUNCAN offered the following, which being objected to, lies over:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of purchasing, for the use of the General Government, Catlin's collection of Indian curiosities.

Mr. HABERSHAM submitted the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary do inquire into the necessity or expediency of so amending the Constitution of the United States, as that the same shall define and prescribe the evidence upon which persons claiming to be members of the House of Representatives of the United States, shall take their seats in the House, and be entitled to exercise the privileges of members, until after the organization of the House, and an investigation and report by the Standing Committee of Elections, on his right or claim to such seat, and a final decision of the House on such report.

On motion of Mr. GOGGIN,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Expenditures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives, and of all the Departments of the Government.

On motion of Mr. LOWELL,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase of the county of Hancock, in the State of Maine, for the use of the United States, three-fourth parts of the fire proof building, situate in Castine, in said county, and now owned in common by the United States and said county.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of erecting a light house at Little river harbor, in the town of Cutler, in the State of Maine.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of establishing a port of entry at Brooksville, in the county of Hancock and State of Maine, within the district of Penobscot, and of providing by law for the appointment of some person as inspector and deputy collector, with a suitable salary, who shall reside at Buck's harbor, in said Brooksville.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of establishing a port of entry at Cherryfield, in the county of Washington and State of Maine, within the district of Machias, and of providing, by law, for the appointment of some person as inspector and deputy collector, with a suitable salary, who shall reside at said Cherryfield.

Mr. DOWNING, of Florida, submitted the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to contract with Mr. Stone, who engraved the military map of Florida, compiled under the direction of General Taylor, to furnish 5,000 additional copies of said map for the use of this House.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON submitted the following, which was objected to, and lies over:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform this House to what instance in which Congress has refused the necessary appropriations for the prosecution of the war in Florida, he alludes, in the following passage of his letter to Governor call, bearing date the 20th June, 1838;

"It (the Department) is still further restricted by the means to provide for but a limited force, as it is with the greatest difficulty that appropriations can be obtained of Congress for even the smallest possible force necessary for the execution of its duty of protecting the inhabitants of Florida or elsewhere."

Mr. STANLY submitted the following, which was objected to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay to the States the fourth instalment due them under the act of July, 1836, whenever there is sufficient money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. ATHERTON submitted the following, which was objected to, and lies over:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the United States Military Academy at West Point.

Mr. S. H. BUTLER submitted the following, which was objected to, and lies over:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to this House his opinion of the expediency of the immediate establishment of a dry dock and naval depot at Pensacola, Florida, and any information in his possession upon the subject.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following, which, being objected to, lies over.

Whereas, by the Sub-Treasury bill, the President and his party propose to receive nothing in payment for public lands but gold and silver, and whereas, in the State of Illinois and other new States, the amount of money paid into the Treasury for public lands amounted to the sum of five millions four hundred and seventeen thousand two hundred and eighty six dollars and thirty-one cents, for the year 1839; and whereas, also, it is probable that the same amount will be received by the Treasury in payment of public lands for the year 1840; and whereas, also, the Secretary of the Treasury has omitted to make any estimate for any of the public works in the West, and, as we have a right to infer from this that it is the policy of the President and his party, that all such works shall be stopped; and that, in consequence thereof, the Government will cease to expend upon these works any part of the moneys collected in the West; and whereas, also, in consequence of the above recited measures of the President and his party, the West will be greatly oppressed, its specie drained off, and transported to those parts where the Government is making its expenditures, and in particular that the settlers on the public lands, who hold their lands by the right of pre-emption, will, by the operation of the above recited measures, be rendered unable to procure the specie, and thus be unable to save their homes—therefore

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be directed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill putting off all sales of public lands until the 4th of March, 1841.

Mr. CASEY offered the following resolution; which, being objected to, lies over:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a uniform law concerning bankruptcies, particularly those of corporations and other bankers.

Mr. SMITH of Maine submitted the following, which was objected to, and lies over:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs inquire into the expediency of increasing the pay of non-commissioned officers and privates in the army.

Mr. REYNOLDS submitted the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to cause a survey and estimates to be made for the continuation of the Cumberland road from Vandalia, by Greenville, to Alton, in the State of Illinois.

Mr. CRABB submitted the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That, with the consent of the Senate, the two Houses of Congress will adjourn sine die on the first day of May next.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana submitted the following, which was objected to, and under the rule lies over;

Resolved, That on Thursday next, at one o'clock, this House will proceed to dispose of the question of instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road; and also to receive such petitions as shall not give rise to debate.

Mr. SALTONSTALL submitted the following, which, being objected to, lies over:

Whereas, five persons duly returned as members of this House by the Executive department of the State of New Jersey, in pursuance of the laws of said State, have not been permitted to take their seats in this House, according to invariable usage heretofore, on the alleged ground that certain other persons were supposed to have had a majority of votes at the polls, whether said votes were legal or not; and although part of said votes were not only returned to the said Executive department, according to the laws of said State, and were therefore not counted by the said Executive; and whereas it is important that each State should be at all times represented in this House, according to its constitutional rights; therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the manner of holding elections for Representatives, and of making returns of said elections.

Mr. BURKE submitted the following, which, being objected to, lies over:

Resolved, That a select committee, to be composed of one member from each State of this Union, be appointed to inquire into the expediency of removing the seat of Government to some suitable location on the Ohio river, and that said committee be authorized to correspond, during the recess of Congress, with the Governors of the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Kentucky, with a view to the selection of a suitable site for the seat of Government; and that said committee be directed to report the result of their inquiries and their conclusions to this House at the commencement of the next session of Congress.

Resolved, further, That Congress has no constitutional power to appropriate the revenues of the General Government derived from the customs, the public domain, or from other sources, for any object in the District of Columbia, except for the erection of public buildings, the repair and improvement of the public property situated within the limits of said District, and for the necessary expenses of the Government.

Resolved, further, That Congress has power to authorize the people of the District of Columbia to levy taxes upon themselves, for all local and municipal purposes; and that when money is required for such purposes such authority should be forthwith granted.

Mr. TILLINGHAST submitted the following, which, being objected to, lies over.

Whereas examinations and surveys have heretofore been made in the Narragansett bay, in Rhode Island, with a view to military and naval establishments, and reports have been made to the Navy Department, and communicated to Congress, containing evidence of the fitness and advantages of a place upon the waters of the bay for a naval depot:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled. That the Secretary of the Navy, as soon as may be, cause such further examinations and surveys to be made as are, in his opinion, necessary for ascertaining the fitness and the relative advantages or disadvantages of a place in the said Narragansett bay for a naval establishment, yard, and depot, on shore, and the best location thereof in said bay, with estimates of probable expense; and that said estimates and the reports of said examinations and surveys, when made, and all such evidence as is now, or may then be, in possession of his Department, as to such fitness and advantages, or disadvantages, be, by the said Secretary communicated to Congress as soon as may be, with such views and opinions as he may deem important.

Resolved further, That for carrying this resolution into effect, there be appropriated the sum of one thousand dollars, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER of Kentucky,

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be instructed to inquire into the propriety of confirming the title of George B. Steele, of Boone county, Kentucky, to a tract of land containing one hundred and fifty-seven and 37-110 acres, entered by him in the Fayetteville land office, in the State of Arkansas, and for which he has paid.

On motion of Mr. CRARY,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if compatible with the public service, whether the Government of Great Britain has expressed to the Government of the United States a desire to annul the arrangement entered into between the two Governments in the month of April, 1817, respecting the naval force to be maintained upon the American Lakes; and that if said arrangement be not annulled, whether there has been any violation of the same by the authorities of Great Britain.

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to enable the Government to make a treaty with the Chippewa Indians for the purchase of their lands bordering on Lake Superior, in the State of Michigan.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws in regard to writs of error and appeals, as to permit parties to sue out and prosecute writs of error and take appeals, upon giving security for costs only, where they are unable to give other security; the writs of error and appeals in such cases not to operate as a supersedeas.

On motion of Mr. HABERSHAM,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of admitting steam vessels or boats built of iron, in countries beyond the limits of the United States, and owned by citizens of the United States, to all the privileges of vessels built in the United States.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER of Ky.

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the propriety of restoring to Mrs. Frances L. Piatt, only daughter of Colonel William Piatt, an invalid pensioner, the pension relinquished by him to the Government, but which he subsequently devised to his said daughter; and that the will of Colonel Piatt, and papers on file in the pension office, be referred to said committee.

Resolved, That the Committee on Private land Claims be instructed to inquire into the propriety of granting to Andrew Johnson of Scott county, Kentucky, any military bounty lands to which Capt. John Johnson of the Virginia line of the Revolution, may be entitled; and that an official transcript of the papers filed by him in the Executive Department of Virginia in support of his claim, be referred to said committee.

The following resolutions, offered by Mr. EVANS on the 10th of February, and laid on the table, were taken up, read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the House whether any, and, if any, what, measures have been taken, since the rejection of the recommendation of the King of Holland of a new line of boundary between the United States and the Province of New Brunswick, to obtain information in respect to the topography of the territory in dispute, by survey or explanation of the same on the part of the United States alone. Also, whether any measures have been adopted whereby the accuracy of the survey lately made under the authority of the British Government, when communicated, may be tested or examined.

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the House copies of the arrangement entered into between the Governor of Maine and Sir John Harvey, Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, through the mediation of Major General Scott, in the month of March last, together with copies of the instructions given to General Scott, and of all correspondence with him relating to the subject of controversy between the State of Maine and the Province of New Brunswick.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a general bankrupt law.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 10, 1840.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from citizens of New York for a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALL presented a similar petition, which was referred to the same committee.

Mr. W. said he embraced that opportunity of saying that the Committee on the Judiciary had a bill in preparation, which would probably be reported the beginning of next week.

Mr. W. also presented a memorial of a number of citizens of New Jersey, asking the establishment of a mail route; which was refered to the Committee on the Post office and Post Roads.

Mr. HENDERSON presented two resolutions of the Legislature of Mississippi, asking the establishment of certain post routes therein designated, which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. H. also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Mississippi, asking that Congress may cause the value of the sixteenth sections in the Chickasaw purchase, to be ascertained, and to pay the same over to the school fund; and also asking a grant of all the public lands in the State, for the purposes of internal improvement; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented the late report of the Alabama Commissioners of the Tennessee river canal, made to the Legislature of that State, exhibiting the progress and present condition of that improvement.

Mr. C. referred to certain joint resolutions of the two Houses of the Alabama Legislature, asking a relinquishment to that State of the exclusive control of the works going on for the removal of obstructions to the navigation of the Tennessee river; which, he said, had been presented at the last session of Congress, and, at its close, left on the files of the Senate; and which had again been referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals at an early day of the present session. Mr. C. stated that the funds produced by the sale of lands heretofore granted for that purpose, (as far as they would sell on the terms authorized by Congress,) had been faithfully applied, and were exhausted, without completing that great work; and the Legislature now asked the proposed relinquishment that they might devise ways and means to remove the remaining obstructions. Mr. C. adverted to the great importance of the improvements contemplated in the river Tennessee, and hoped the subject would receive early consideration by the committee. He said, although the principal obstructions, presented by the Muscle Shoals, had been overcome by a canal, about fifteen miles in length, there yet remained other obstructions, above and below, which required removal; and without which navigation could not be carried on in ordinary tides of the river.

The documents presented by Mr. C. were referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. NORVELL presented the petition of J. L. Schoolcraft, praying the payment of a sum of money guarantied to be paid to him in a treaty with the Ottowa and Chippewa Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented two memorials asking for the imposition of a moderate duty on imported silks; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. C. also presented various memorials remonstrating against the use of bloodhounds in the Florida war; which were laid on the table.

Mr. SOUTHARD also presented a memorial in relation to the bloodhounds; which was also laid on the table.

M. TALLMADGE presented a memorial of citizens of New York in favor of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BENTON presented a memorial from citizens of Missouri, praying for a passage of a pre-emption law for the better security of the settlers on the public lands; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. PORTER presented the petition of Henry H. Brown; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. STURGEON presented the petition of a number of masters and owners of steamboats navigating the western waters, praying a modification of the act of July 7, 1838; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. S. also presented two memorials remonstrating against the use of bloodhounds in the Florida war; which were laid on the table.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Pierre Bonhommie; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of the heirs of Robert Fulton, made a detailed report adverse to the claim, which he gave notice he would call up this day two weeks.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel McKay; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the claim of Frederick Sammons, made an adverse report thereon.

Mr. NORVELL submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate, if in his judgment compatible with the public interest, any information he may possess, or which may have been received by any Department of the Executive, touching any fortification or military works which have been constructed within the last eighteen months, or which may be in progress of construction, or any naval or military armaments which have been prepared, or may be preparing, by the British authorities along or near the Northern and Northwestern frontiers of the United States.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to the Senate a detailed chronological statement of the purchases of land made from each Indian tribe within the limits of the United States since the establishment of the present Federal Government; showing the successive purchases in each tribe separately, with the whole amount given by the United States in consideration thereof, whether in money, lands, goods, provisions, or aids, or in any other way whatsoever—the whole to be arranged under proper heads, with such remarks as may be necessary to exhibit a just view of the full amount paid and contracted for to be paid in consideration of each purchase, and followed by a general table to show the total of the purchases and payments in the case of each tribe, and also the aggregate of the whole.

The bills ordered to be engrossed yesterday were severally read a third time and passed.

The bill to relinquish to the State of Alabama the two per cent fund reserved by the act of her admission into the Union, to be applied to the making of a road or roads leading to said State;

The bill to establish an additional land district in the State of Alabama; and

The bill authorizing a patent to be issued to Joseph Campan; were severally considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 10, 1840.

The reading of the journal having progressed for some time,

Mr. LEET rose and said he could perceive no particular advantage to the House, in having the resolutions submitted on yesterday read over by the CLERK this morning. They were very numerous, and have no doubt been carefully copied into the journal, and will be published. Mr. L. intimated his intention to move that the further reading be dispensed with; but

Mr. STANLY demanding the reading to be proceeded with,

Mr LEET did not press his motion.

The CLERK having continued the reading of the resolutions for some time,

On motion of Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama, the further reading of the journal was dispensed with.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia wished to submit a motion to amend the journal of yesterday, which he knew could only be done by the universal consent of the House. He on yesterday submitted a resolution proposing to have printed, for the use of the members, a sermon on Christian courtesy, delivered on the last Sabbath by the Chaplain of the House. He did not apprehend that the resolution would meet with any objection. He had since understood that the resolution was objected to on the ground of discourtesy to the members. He was the last man in that House who would knowingly do an act which could even admit of such a construction. His only object was to call to the minds of the members what he believed they well knew individually. The only request that he then wished to make, was, that he might be permitted to withdraw the resolution from the journal. He wished to withdraw it, because it was understood by some gentlemen as discourteous. He had other reasons which if necessary he could state.

The question was put, and the House unanimously agreed to the withdrawal.

Mr. GRAVES made a motion to modify his resolution, which appeared on the journal of yesterday, in relation to his call on the Postmaster General; and the proposition having been ruled out of order, he made a motion to suspend the rules, for the purpose; which was disagreed to without a count.

Mr. RANDOLPH inquired of the CHAIR whether the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] respecting the Governor, was entered on the journal.

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative?

Mr. RANDOLPH said he understood that the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. COOPER,] had on yesterday demanded the question of reception. He thought that when the question of reception was moved, the matter on which it was moved, did not go on the journal until that question was decided.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia said he moved the question of consideration. His object was to test the question of reception. He confessed that he was unwilling, at this time, that the preamble should be received.

The SPEAKER said the question of consideration only having been moved, the resolution was received, and on that motion was laid over under the rule.

Mr. STANLY moved to amend the journal by inserting the name of the member who on yesterday objected to the consideration of his resolution proposing that the General Government should pay over the instalment due to the States of the surplus revenue.

Mr. DROMGOOLE, who had objected on yesterday, was perfectly willing that his name should appear on the journal, though it was unusual to do so.

The SPEAKER said it was not usual to insert on the journal the name of the gentleman objecting; and that it could not be done except by a vote of the House.

Mr. STANLY moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose; which was, however, disagreed to without a count.

Mr. BOTTS asked leave of the House to present a report from the minority of the Committee of Elections in relation to the New Jersey claimants.

The SPEAKER said it could only be received by the general consent of the House.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected to the reception of the report. He had no objection to receiving it and having it printed with the report of the majority of the committee, but he was opposed to letting it in at that time to interfere with the question before the House.

Mr. BOTTS moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to present the report; and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. DROMGOOLE wished to know what would be the effect of receiving the minority report. He asked if the House took any action on it—whether it would supersede the business now before the House.

The SPEAKER was of opinion that it would not.

Mr. TURNEY: I want to know what would be the effect of suspending the rules, if a debate should spring up on a motion to print these papers. Would that interfere with the pending business on which the previous question had been moved?

The SPEAKER was of opinion that it would.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut: On behalf of the minority of the Committee of Elections, I wish to say that it is not our intention to move the printing of the minority report, nor to interfere with the other question before the House.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and resulted—yeas 126, nays 80.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER announced that the business before the House was the proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FILLMORE,] as follows:

Whereas this House did, by a resolution adopted on the 28th February, 1840, among other things, direct the Committee of Elections "to report forthwith which five of the ten individuals claiming seats from the State of New Jersey received the greatest number of lawful votes from the whole State for Representatives in the Congress of the United States at the election of 1838, in said State."

And whereas this House had previously referred evidence to that committee tending to show that the poll at South Amboy, in said State, at said election, was not held according to law, and that numerous votes given at said election were unlawful, because the persons voting had no legal right to vote, and the parties to said contest are now absent from this city with the consent and under the authority of said committee, taking testimony in said case, for the purpose of ascertaining who received the greatest number of lawful votes at said election in said State. And whereas certain depositions alleged to have been taken by one of the parties to said contest, in pursuance of the directions of said committee, in a sealed envelope, were addressed to the Speaker of this House, tending to show, as is alleged, that the polls at South Amboy were not held according to law, and that unlawful votes were taken at said poll. And whereas said committee, in acting on the resolution of this House, refused to consider any portion of said evidence, but determined to report, and have reported, simply the number "of votes adjudged to have been given to the several claimants by the Governor and Privy Council of New Jersey, together with those returned by the election officers of the townships of Millville, in Cumberland county, and South Amboy, in Middlesex county, to the clerks of said counties respectively," without inquiring whether said votes were lawful or not.

Therefore resolved, That said report be recommitted to said committee with instructions to inquire and report to this House, with all convenient despatch, which five of the ten claimants to the vacant seats in this House from said State received the greatest number of lawful votes at the last Congressional election in said State.

And the following substitute therefor, offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PETRIKIN,] on which the previous question had been moved:

Whereas it appears by the report of the Committee of Elections that Philemon Dickerson, Peter D. Vroom, Daniel B. Ryall, William R. Cooper, and Joseph Kille, received the greates number of lawful votes cast in the State of New Jersey, at the election holden in that State for Representatives in the Twenty-sixth Congress:

Resolved, That Philemon Dickerson, Peter D. Vroom, Daniel B. Ryall, William Cooper, and Joseph Kille, are entitled to take their seats in the House of Representatives, as members of the Twenty-sixth Congress, and that the Speaker of the House, on their presenting themselves, qualify them as such: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the investigation into said election from being continued in the manner heretofore authorized by a majority of the Committee of Elections, on the application of the five claimants for said seats.

Mr. PETRIKIN then asked leave to modify his amendment, by inserting the words "prima facie upon the evidence in possession of the committee," to come in after the word "that," in the second line.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut apprehended that the modification was not in order, after the previous question was called. A new proposition would then be before the House.

Mr. BOTTS inquired whether the previous question could be put on a proposition that never was before the House. If the modification of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was made, the proposition would be a new one, and not the one on which the previous question was moved.

The CHAIR said that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had a right to make the modification, before the question was taken.

Mr. LINCOLN made some remarks which, from the noise and confusion prevailing at the time, were not heard, and concluded by appealing from the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. PETRIKIN then said that, as his modification had created so much noise and confusion among the Opposition members, he would, in order to relieve the SPEAKER and the House from further embarrassment, withdraw his modification.

The appeal, then, of course, fell to the ground, and the question was taken by tellers—Messrs. BYNUM of North Carolina and CAMPBELL of Tennessee—who, after counting the voters passing through them, announced the result as—ayes 109, noes 81.

Mr. FILLMORE then called for the yeas and nays on the previous question, which were ordered, and resulted in—yeas 113, nays 94.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut here moved to lay the resolution and amendment on the table, and this question was decided in the negative—yeas 92, nays 113, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Bond, Botts, Brockway, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dillett, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Grinnel, Habersham, W. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Henry Williams, Sherrod Williams, and Worthington—113.

Mr. RANDOLPH asked if a motion to postpone would be in order.

The SPEAKER replied in the negative.

Mr. RANDOLPH asked for the reading of the proviso in the amendment, which was done.

Mr. R. then asked for the reading of the proviso in the original instructions moved by the gentleman from Tennessee, but

Mr. PETRIKIN objecting, it was done.

The SPEAKER having announced the main question to be on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PETRIKIN,]

Mr. RANDOLPH called for a division of the question, so as take it first on all that part of the amendment preceding the proviso; but withdrew the call at the request of Mr. FILLMORE.

The SPEAKER again put the question to the House; when

Mr. MONROE asked if it was now in order for him to state his reasons for not voting on this question; and if it was not now in order, he desired to know when it would be in order.

The SPEAKER replied that it would not be in order, but that the gentleman could ask to be excused from voting, and then give his reasons for desiring to be excused.

Mr. MUNROE then rose and asked the House to excuse him from voting on the question. His reasons were these: he was called upon to vote upon a question which he did not understand the whole merits of. He had not read the report of the committee, and had not heard it read so as to understand it. It had not been printed, and he was called upon to vote on a question before this House, involving greater constitutional difficulties than it had ever been called on to decide. He now solemnly protested against being compelled to vote, and he called on the House to excuse him from committing so great an outrage on his conscience.

The question was then taken, and Mr. MUNROE was excused from voting without a division.

The yeas and nays were then called over by the CLERK; and when the name of Mr. GOGGIN was called, he asked if he could have the privilege of assigning his reasons for the vote he was about to give; but the SPEAKER declared that he could not, under the rules of the House, do so. The CLERK then proceeded with, and finished, the call of the yeas and nays, when, and before the result was announced by the CHAIR,

Mr. RUSSELL rose and observed that the importance of the question induced him to ask whether those gentlemen who were within the Hall, and had not voced, should not be required to do so. There were several gentlemen, he said, present, who had not voted when called by the CLERK.

The SPEAKER replied that he had no power over the subject.

Mr. RUSSELL wished to know whether there was not a rule of the House requiring every member who was present to vote.

The SPEAKER informed the gentleman that there was such a rule, but it was it was not the province of the CHAIR to enforce it. The only course of the gentleman was to submit a motion for the House to decide.

Mr. RUSSELL. There are in the House, and in their seats, several gentlemen who have not responded to the call of the CLERK, and I understand that they will not. Now, whether the votes of these gentlemen will or will not change the result, I will not inquire. I only wish to inquire whether the rule is to be enforced, and I now ask the SPEAKER to have the names of the gentlemen who declined voting, called.

The SPEAKER said that the only way for the gentleman to accomplish his object was to designate the names of the gentleman who were in their seats, and declined voting.

Mr. RUSSELL said that he would do so; and first, he would name the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,] and ask that he be called on to vote.

The SPEAKER. He has been called on to vote.

Mr. PROFFIT. I move that he be compelled to vote.

Much noise and confusion prevailing,

Mr. COOPER of Georgia called on the CHAIR to preserve order; and

The SPEAKER having succeeded in restoring order,

Mr. RUSSELL assured the House that it was with no desire to embarrass its proceedings that he persisted in his motion. His object was to determine whether the rules of the House were or were not to be regarded, and he would therefore ask the attention of the House while he read the 36th rule. Mr. R. then read the 36th rule, the substance of which is that when a question is taken, every member who is present in the hall shall vote on it, unless excused by the House. Mr. R. concluded by expressing the hope that the rule would be enforced.

The SPEAKER asked the gentleman to submit a motion.

Mr. RUSSELL then submitted a resolution that JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, a member of this House from Massachusetts, and now in his seat, be required to vote on the question pending, before the vote on the same is announced.

Mr. DROMGOOLE and several other gentlemen rose at the same time, inquiring whether the resolution was in order at this time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland appealed to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RUSSELL] to withdraw his resolution. He could see no good that could be affected by any attempt on the part of this House to enforce this particular rule when an individual refusing to vote was more responsible to the country than he was to the House. He hoped the gentleman would not embarrass the proceedings of the House by persisting in this motion, and in which, if it prevailed, the House might be foiled in attempting to carry it out.

As the decision of the House on this question could not be altered even by adding in the votes of the few who had not voted, he hoped the gentleman would not deem it necessary to persist in his motion. It was, he thought, a delicate matter to attempt to compel gentlemen to vote on questions in regard to which they entertained conscientious scruples. He voted himself under great doubts; and he for one would rather have subjected himself to the censures of this House than to the censures of his conscience, had he entertained the scruples that he understood these gentlemen did. This was a question in relation to which any conscientious man might avoid voting on, for as the report stated that the gentlemen named in it had received the greatest number of lawful votes, they might well hesitate about voting against it. He himself believed that the report stated the facts incorrectly, and therefore had voted against he amendment. He could see no possible good in attempting to enforce the rules, when it was obvious that such doubts were tentertained by the gentlemen who declined voting.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked if debate was in order.

The SPEAKER replied that it was.

Mr PETRIKIN then moved to lay Mr. RUSSELL'S resolution on the table.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RUSSELL then modified his resolution, so as to read in substance as follows:

Resolved, That the House do refuse to excuse JOHN Q. ADAMS, JOHN W. ALLEN, and EDWARD STANLY, (and one other name not heard by the Reporter,) from voting on the question pending before the House, and that the CLERK call on these gentlemen to vote.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said it was not in order to offer a resolution that the House will refuse to excuse gentlemen from voting who have not asked to be excused. It was also out of order to move a resolution after the yeas and nays had been taken, and before the result was announced by the CHAIR. It was not in order to interpose any motion to delay the announciation of the result of the vote that had been taken. When that result was announced, gentlemen might then, if they pleased, arraign those members who had been refractory, and had refused vote.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

26TH CONG.....1ST SESS. TUESDAY, MARCH 24, 1840. VOLUME 8.....No. 17

BY BLAIR & RIVES. ——WEEKLY—— PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

Mr. CUSHING rose for the purpose of confirming the point of order made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DROMGOOLE.] It was not in order to move that the House refuse to excuse gentlemen from voting who have not asked to be excused.

The SPEAKER said the modification of the gentleman from New York was not in order.

Mr. RUSSELL then withdrew his modification, and observed that he rested on his original resolution.

The SPEAKER then stated the question to be on the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RUSSELL.]

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. DROMGOOLE rose to the same point of order on the resolution that had been decided in the modification. It was not in order for the House to entertain a motion after the yeas and nays had been called and before the result was announced. Besides, Mr. D. said the House could not compel a gentleman to vote who declined voting.

The SPEAKER said that no compulsion was contemplated in the resolution, and that it was in order then to offer it, for that was the only time at which it could be offered to have any effect.

Mr. DROMGOOLE appealed from the decision of the CHAIR. The yeas and nays, he said, had just been taken, and before the result was announced, they were called upon to take the yeas and nays again on another motion, and perhaps to be followed by a similar motion, should any gentleman refuse to vote. He implored the House to save them from such an absurdity as that of again taking the yeas and nays before the result was announced on the question that had been taken. Mr. D. then moved the previous question on the appeal, which having been seconded, and the previous question put and carried,

Mr. RUSSELL demanded the yeas and nays on the main question on the appeal; which were ordered, and resulted, yeas 87, nays 103.

So the decision of the CHAIR being reversed,

The votes of the members, as they severally voted on the main question of Mr. PETRIKIN's amendment, were called over by the Clerk, and

The SPEAKER announced the result to be yeas 111, nays 91, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Conner, Craig, Crary, Cross, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Davis, Doan, Doig, Droomgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gerry, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Holmes, Hook, Howard, Hubbard, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rhett, Rives, Robinson, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweeny, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Henry Williams, and Worthington—111.

NAYS—Messrs. Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Botts, Brockway, William B. Campbell, Carter, Caton, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dillett, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Kempshall, King, Lincoln, McCarty, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Nisbet, Osborne, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Storrs, Stuart, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Sherrod Williams—91.

The amendment of Mr. PETRIKIN having been thus adopted the question recurred on the resolution as amended.

Mr. TURNEY called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays; but before the result was announced from the CHAIR,

Mr. HABERSHAM, who was absent when his name was called, asked leave to have his vote recorded in the negative.

Cries of no, no, not in order, from several.

The SPEAKER said that the gentleman could not now vote, without the general consent of the House.

Mr. HABERSHAM then moved to suspend the rules, in order to admit a motion to allow him to vote.

Mr. TURNEY inquired if the motion of the gentleman from Georgia was in order. It was decided by the vote on the appeal taken by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] that no motion was in order after the yeas and nays had been taken, before the result was announced from the CHAIR.

The SPEAKER said the motion of the gentleman from Georgia was not in order, and then announced the result of the vote just taken, as—yeas 111, nays 80, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, Wm. O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Conner, Craig, Crary, Cross, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Davis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gerry, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, John Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Holmes, Hook, Howard, Hubbard Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, J. W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montgomery, S. W. Morris, Newhard, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rhett, Rives, Robinson, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweeny, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Henry Williams, and Worthington—111.

NAYS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Botts, Brockway, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Grinnell, William S. Hastings, Richard Hawes, Thomas Henry, John Hill of Virginia, Ogden Hoffman, Francis James, Daniel Jenifer, Charles Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Kempshall, Lincoln, McCarty, Marvin, Mason, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Nisbet, Osborne, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, E. Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Simonton, Storrs, Stuart, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, John White, Lewis Williams, J. L Williams, and C. H. Williams—80.

So the resolution, as amended by Mr. PETRIKIN's substitute, was adopted; and Messrs. DICKERSON, VROOM, KILLE, RYALL, and COOPER were declared to be entitled to take their seats as members of the Twenty-sixth Congress from the State of New Jersey, and that the SPEAKER, on their presenting themselves, qualify them as such.

Mr. J. W. JONES called for the orders of the day.

Mr. DROMGOOLE hoped his colleague would not press that motion, but that the House would, by universal consent, agree to receive the report of the minority of the Committee of Elections, and that both reports and testimony be printed.

Mr. BOTTS said, as the judgment of the House had been pronounced on the question of the New Jersey claimants, he hoped that there was no objection to introducing the report of the minority of the Committee of Elections on that subject.

There was no objection, but

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana demanded the yeas and nays. Gentlemen voted this morning against receiving this report; he now wished to see their names recorded in favor of receiving it.

The SPEAKER said there was no objection. The consent was unanimous; and consequently there was no question upon which to call the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARLAND insisted upon it that he had the right to call the yeas and nays on the motion. Gentlemen had this morning recorded their names against receiving this report; but now, after having pronounced judgment, they were willing to receive it. He wanted to see their votes now recorded in opposition to those in the morning.

Mr. DROMGOOLE desired to know if it was in order to call the yeas and nays on a motion, which had been received by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER inquired of the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. GARLAND, whether he objected to the reception of the report.

Mr. GARLAND said he did not object; but he wished to have the yeas and nays on its reception.

Mr. W. B. CALHOUN said he would object to the reception of the report. It had been suppressed to day; and, therefore, he wished it to go forth to the world as a suppressed report. He entreated his friend from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] to withdraw his motion.

Mr. BOTTS said he could not consent to do so. This was the very day, of all others, that he wanted the question to be taken. He wished it published as a justification of his vote.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS moved a suspension of the rules to permit the presentation of the report.

Mr. R. GARLAND demanded the yeas and nays on that motion. Gentlemen are very willing now to let in this report, after they have decided the question, but they refused to receive it this morning.

Mr. McCLELLAN inquired whether a motion to suspend the rules twice on the same day on the same question, was in order.

The CHAIR said it was not in order.

Much confusion now prevailing in the hall,

Mr. RAMSEY moved that the House adjourn; but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. KEMBLE renewed the motion, and said he would not withdraw it.

Mr. CRABB demanded the yeas and nays on the motion; which were ordered, and were—yeas 95, nays 87. Accordingly,

The House adjourned.

WASHINGTON, March 10, 1840.

GENTLEMEN: Please insert in the Globe that Messrs. HALL and FLETCHER of Vermont, who would have voted on opposite sides, were absent from the House on Tuesday by mutual agreement, and did not vote upon the different questions that were taken.

Respectfully, J. FLETCHER.

Messrs. BLAIR and RIVES.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, March 11, 1840.

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the 30th December, containing tabular statements showing the amount of duties received, and the amount of drawbacks paid on the same, since 1833; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of the Territory of Florida, asking admission into the Union, and deprecating any division of said Territory; which were referred to the Select Committee on the Florida Territory.

Also, a petition from Thomas Quantril, asking a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE.

Mr. LUMPKIN presented the following resolutions of the Legislature of Georgia:

The Federal Constitution having been framed partially with a view to regulate the constitutional intercourse between the sovereign States that ordained it, and having conferred all the powers necessary and proper for carrying its provisions into full effect upon a Congress of the United States, it is incumbent on that body, by its legislation, to secure the several States in the enjoyment of their constitutional rights. Not the least important stipulation in that compact is, that "a" person charged with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the Executive authority of the State from which he fled, to be delivered up to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

Doubtless the past legislation on this subject has been predicated upon the presumption that each State having, in the pledged faith of all the others, a sufficient guarantee, nothing more was requisite than to prescribe the forms which should give authenticity to the demand; doubtless, too, in the time which gave birth to the Constitution, whilst the Union was young and her Revolutionary associations fresh and warm, this presumption found its warrant in the mutual fidelity which promptly responded to all Executive demands. To this generation has been reserved the humiliating spectacle of a sovereign State making herself a city of refuge for fugitive felons from her sister confederates. Two such cases of recent occurrence demonstrate the utter inefficiency of the existing laws for carrying into effect the provision of the Constitution. They, moreover, clearly indicate the cause of this inefficiency. Those laws are dependent for their execution upon the mere will of the Executive officers of the several States, who neither are nor can be made responsible to the General Government. If, then, it be correctly assumed that the Federal Legislature is bound to make ample provision for the contemplated exigency, and if experience has proved that reliance on State authorities is delusive, the question occurs whether there be any other mode which gives fairer promise of security? May not the object be accomplished by employing in that service officers appointed by, and responsible to, the Federal Government? Inasmuch as that Government has employed in every State of the Union competent judicial and ministerial officers, it is believed that this duty, enjoined by the highest obligation, and intimately connected with the harmony and perpetuity of the Union, may be appropriately and efficiently performed through their instrumentality. There would seem to be a peculiar fitness in providing that the aid which she is bound to afford to the State judiciaries, should result from the action of her own judiciary. The process would be simple, and the agents directly responsible to the power whence the laws to be executed emanate.

Be it therefore resolved, That the statutes of the United States enacted to carry into effect the latter clause of the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution are wholly inadequate to the object.

Be it further resolved, That, in the opinion of this General Assembly, those statutes should be so amended as, 1st, to authorize the demand in the cases contemplated to be made upon the Circuit Judge of the United States having jurisdiction in the State wherein such fugitive may be found; 2d, to require that such judge, upon such demand being made in due form of law, shall issue his warrant to be directed to the Marshal of the United States in the State wherein such fugitive may be requiring his arrest and delivery to the agent duly authorized to receive him who shall be named in such warrant; 3d, to require each marshal, to whom any such warrant shall be delivered, forthwith to execute the same.

Be it further resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, to have the act of Congress, passed on the 12th of February, 1793, to carry into effect the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States, so amended as to make it obligatory on the said district judge to surrender any person who may be found in any State or Territory, and who is charged, in any other State or Territory, with the commission of any act which is constituted a crime by the laws of said State or Territory, where he is so charged, to the Executive authority of the State or Territory where the offence is alleged to have been committed.

Be it further resolved, That his Excellency the Governor be requested to forward to our Senators and Representatives in Congress copies of the above preamble and resolutions, with a request that they endeavor to procure such amendments of the statutes in question, as in their judgment will be best calculated to affect the desired object. ROBT. M. ECHOLS,

President of the Senate.

Attest: DAVID J. BAILEY.

JOSEPH DAY,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Attest: JOSEPH SURGES, Clerk.

APPROVED, 24th December, 1839.

CHARLES J. McDONALD, Governor.

Mr. LUMPKIN said: Mr. President, I must ask the indulgence of the Senate, while I submit a few remarks in connection with the subject of the resolutions that have just been read by the Secretary of the Senate. These resolutions have received the sanction of a majority of both branches of the Legislature of Georgia, as well as the assent of the Governor of the State. They therefore possess all the requisite forms of legislation required by the Constitution of the State that I in part represent, to entitle them to my highest respect and consideration. Moreover, I am instructed by these resolutions to sustain the views of the Legislature, as therein pointed out and suggested.

In order, Mr. President, that the Senate and the people of the United States may clearly understand the pending controversy between the two States—Georgia and Maine—I deem it important that a history of the facts and circumstances connected with the case should be briefly presented. They are as follows:

In May, 1837, a man slave by the name of Atticus, the property of James Sagurs and Henry Sagurs, citizens of the city of Savannah, and county of Chatham, in the State of Georgia, was conveyed to the State of Maine, by Daniel Philbrook and Edward Killeran, citizens of the State of Maine, being master and mate of the vessel on board of which said slave was conveyed; which vessel was known by the name of the schooner Boston, and which had recently been in the port of Savannah. On the 16th of June, in the same year, James Sagurs, one of the owners of said slave, complained on oath before a magistrate of Chatham county, that Daniel Philbrook and Edward Killeran "did, on or about the 4th day of May last, feloniously enveigle, take, steal, and carry away, without the limits of the State of Georgia," the slave Atticus; that the said Daniel Philbrook and Edward Killeran have been guilty, as the deponent is informed and believes, of a felony under the laws of this State; and "that since the commission of said felony, the said Philbrook and Killeran have fled from this State, and are, as he believes, at this time, within the limits of the State of Maine, in the United States."

Whereupon a warrant for the apprehension of Philbrook and Killeran was issued by the magistrate before whom the information was made. On the same day, the officer charged with its execution, made a return that they were not to be found in the county of Chatham. And on the 21st of the same month, the then Governor of the State of Georgia, William Schley, made a demand upon Robert P. Dunlap, then Governor of the State of Maine, of Philbrook and Killeran, as fugitives from the justice of the laws of Georgia, charged with feloniously inveigling, stealing, taking and carrying away the slave Atticus, and transmitted, with his demand, a copy of the affidavit and warrant, and the return, duly authenticated. On the 16th of August of the same year, Governor Dunlap addressed to Governor Schley a communication, in which he declined to cause the arrest of Philbrook and Killeran.

In December, 1837, the Legislature of Georgia adopted resolutions declaring the refusal of the Governor of Maine to surrender Philbrook and Killeran, dangerous to the rights of the people of Georgia, and directly and clearly in violation of the plain letter and spirit of the Constitution of the United States. That the State of Georgia came a party to the Federal Constitution no less for the better protection of her own than the common rights and interests of all, and that when these ends are defeated, she is released from the obligations of that compact, and it has become her right and her duty to provide protection for her people in her own way. That when an indictment should be found against Philbrook and Killeran, the Executive be requested to renew the demand for their arrest; and if the demand be again refused by the Executive of Maine, that a copy of its resolutions be transmitted to the Executive of each State of the Union, to be laid before their respective Legislatures; that a copy be transmitted to the President of the United States, and to the Senators and Representatives of Georgia, in Congress, to be submitted to that body; and if the Legislature of Maine, at its next session after these resolutions shall have been forwarded by the Executive of that State, neglect to redress the grievance complained of, then the Executive of Georgia shall announce the same by proclamation, and call a convention of the people, to take into consideration the state of the Commonwealth of Georgia, and to devise the course of her future policy, and provide all necessary safeguards for the protection of her rights of her people.

On the 7th of February, 1838, an indictment charging Philbrook and Killeran with larceny, in feloniously inveigling, stating, taking, and carrying away the slave Atticus, was found by the grand jury of Chatham county; and on the 27th of April following, Governor Gilmer, the successor of Gov. Schley, made upon Gov. Kent, the successor of Gov. Duulap, the demand requested by the Legislature of Georgia, and accompanied the demand with a copy of the indictment found, and the proceedings on which it was founded, duly authenticated. On the 25th of June following, Governor Kent declined to order the arrest and surrender required by the authorites of Georgia.

On the 19th of August, 1839, Governor Gilmer addressed a communication to Governor Fairfield, the successor of Governor Kent, requesting to be informed of the action of the Legislature of Maine on the subject of the resolutions of Georgia, and received for answer the proceedings of the Legislature of Maine, declaring it inexpedient to legislate on the subject, as it is exclusively within the province of the Executive Department. The second clause of the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides, "That a person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall, on the demand of the Executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime."

Moreover, the act of Congress of 1793 declares, "that whenever the Executive authority of any State in the Union, or either of the Territories, northwest or south of the river Ohio, shall demand any person, as a fugitive from justice, of the Executive authority of any such State or Territory, to which such person shall have fled, and shall moreover produce the copy of an indictment found, or an affidavit made before a magistrate of any State or Territory as aforesaid, charging the person so demanded with having committed treason, felony, or other crime, certified as authentic by the Governor, or Chief Magistrate of the State or Territory from which the person so charged fled, it shall be the duty of the Executive authority of such State or Territory to which such person shall have fled, to cause him or her to be arrested and surrendered, and notice of the arrest to be given to the Executive authority making the demand, or to the agent of such authority appointed to receive the fugitive, and to cause the fugitive to be delivered to such agent when he shall appear. And further, sir. By the penal code of Georgia, "simple larceny is the felonious taking and carrying away the personal goods of another;" and the same code provides, that "any person or persons who shall feloniously take and carry away a slave, shall be punished by imprisonment and hard labor in the penitentiary, for any time not less than three years, and not longer than seven years."

Thus, sir, I have given a brief statement of the principal facts connected with this case, up to the meeting of the Legislature of Georgia, which passed the resolutions now presented to the Senate. And I must be permitted to say, that I entertain no doubt of these simple facts being amply sufficient to justify and vindicate the prudence, the justice, and patriotism, of every step taken by the authorities of Georgia in connection with this matter. If a more ample vindication of the proceedings of Georgia be sought for, it may be found in an attentive perusal of the correspondence of the Governors of the two States on this subject, which I will herewith present. I feel confident, sir, that no Senator in this hall could rise from a full investigation of this subject, without a settled conviction of the spirit of justice, forbearance, and patriotism, of the State of Georgia, in connection with this controversy.

I am aware, sir, that the moderation and forbearance of Georgia in this case, has been censured and reproached by some. But, sir, forbearance and magnanimity become those who are conscious that they contend for nothing but what is strictly right, and will ultimately submit to nothing which is materially wrong. I believe, Mr. President, there was some diversity of opinion in one branch of the Legislature which passed these resolutions. Those who opposed their passage, were unwilling to bring the subject before the Congress of the United States. They preferred seeking redress by State legislation, relying at once upon the reserved rights and sovereignty of the State to protect its citizens from all such aggressions as that complained of in the case now under consideration. And I consider it my duty, sir, to state, upon the present occasion, that I entertain no doubt of the constitutional right, power, and expediency, of the States of this Union protecting their own citizens in their property of every description; and in every case where the rights of property are not constitutionally protected by the Federal Government, then the duty of affording the proper protection to the citizen, devolves on the States. And, sir, I am not mistaken when I assure you that this right of the State is fully admitted and recognised by that portion of the Legislature of Georgia, who passed these resolutions, as fully as fully as by those who were opposed to their passage. The patriotic object of the Legislature in the passage of these resolutions, is, if practicable, to avoid further controversy and conflict with a sister State—to avoid all measures that may be calculated to weaken the bonds of the Federal Union. Therefore this subject has been submitted to the deliberation and wisdom of Congress. I forbear the expression of any opinion at this time, as to the expediency and constitutionality of further legislation by Congress on this subject. It is a subject which demands the most grave consideration. It is a subject involving questions of the greatest importance to the peace and harmony of this Union. Therefore, if any thing can with propriety be done by Congress, to aid in the avoidance of such controversies as the one now under consideration, what may be properly done ought to be done without unnecessary delay.

If this Federal Government has no constitutional right to interpose efficiently in preventing these conflicts between the authorities of the Statest then the States must of necessity and right ask for themselves.

I will again repeat, sir, that I presume that unanimity of feeling and opinion pervades the breasts of all parties and classes in Georgia, in regard to the constitutional right of the State, to legislate efficiently in protecting our slave property from such aggressions as the one complained of in the present case. It is true, these resolutions, as I am informed, were opposed in their passage by some of the gentlemen, who call themselves State Rights men; and be it far from me to deny to them the right of their selection of a name. But suffer me, sir, to assure you and the Senate that those who passed the resolutions on your table, are no less backward in defending State Rights, than those who are known by that name. There is no party in Georgia opposed to State Rights. We are all in favor of a strict construction of the Constitution of the United States. This Government is considered by all to be a Government of enumerated powers. The principle, that it can exercise only the powers granted to it by the Constitution, is now universally admitted by all parties in Georgia. Though the application of these principles, has produced, will occasionally produce, conflicting opinions and views, and will probably continue to do so as long as our system of Government exists. I take it to be a settled principle in the State of Georgia, agreed to by all parties, that those subjects of legislation which are not enumerated in the surrender to the General Government, remain subject to State legislation and regulation; and it follows, of course, that the sovereignty of the States over all subjects, not having been abridged, impaired, or altered by the Constitution of the United States, is as perfect, full, and complete as if the Constitution of the United States had never been adopted. Each State now, as before the adoption of the Federal Constitution, is a single sovereign power, a nation over whom no external power can operate, whose jurisdiction is necessarily exclusive and absolute within its own boundaries, and susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself, by a constitutional grant of power to the Federal Union. The original jurisdiction of the State adheres to its territory as a portion of its sovereignty not yet given away, or subject to the grant of power in the Federal Constitution, and may therefore be numbered with the residuary powers which remain in the State. But, sir, having expressed the opinion that the State has the constitutional right to protect the property of her citizens, suffer me to remark, in support of that opinion, that the history of the adoption of the articles of confederation, as well as that of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, affords demonstration, that the people of the several States, however desirous to form a Confederation, Union, or General Government, were never willing for a moment, under any circumstances, to confide to a General Government the control or management of their separate and internal policy. The greatest fear of granting the power of taxation to the Federal Government, did not arise so much from a fear of taxation itself, as that the power might be used as a pretext for interfering with their internal affairs.

It was indipensable, however, to the efficiency of any Federal Government, that it should have the power of regulating foreign commerce, and between the States, by laws of uniform operation throughout the United States, yet it was considered at the time one of the most delicate subjects that could be touched, on account of the difficulty of imposing restraints upon the extension of such power, to matters not directly appertaining to commercial regulation. This cautious spirit may be plainly seen in the guarded language of the Constitution, in the grant of the power of taxation, and the regulation of commerce, which give them in the most express terms, yet in such as admit of no extension to other subjects of legislation, which are not included in the enumeration of powers. Congress, while limited to the objects of taxation defined in the Constitution, may not expect to come into collision with State laws; but the power to regulate commerce is admitted to be a subject of great difficulty, owing to the peculiar situation of our country, and form of our political institutions. In other nations it is only of two descriptions, foreign and domestic; in a confederate Government we necessarily have a third—that is, commerce between the constituent members of the confederacy. And in the United States, there was a fourth which was carried on with the numerous Indian tribes who, at the formation of the Federal Constitution, occupied a vast portion of the territory. Each description of commerce recognised in the Constitution of the United States, is, from its nature, distinct from the other, in the mode of conducting it, the subjects of operation, and its regulation.

Let it be kept in mind that the States have never surrendered their rights to regulate internal commerce, within their own boundaries. The grant given to the Federal Government is confined "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes;" which necessarily restricts the term, commerce to that which concerns more than one; and the enumeration of the particular cases to which the power was to be extended, presupposes something to which it does not extend.

Therefore, the right of the States to pass inspection, quarantine, and health laws of every description, has never been surrendered to the Federal Government, nor can the exercise of such a right be questioned upon sound constitutional principles. No general power over these objects having been granted to Congress, consequently they remain subject to State legislation. The quarantine, health, and inspection laws of the States, have very properly, in most cases, have been made to operate directly on the subjects of commerce—the ship, the cargo, the crew and passengers, are brought within the operation of these State laws.

On the very same principle by which a State may prevent the introduction of infected persons, or goods, and articles dangerous to the persons and property of its citizens, it may exclude paupers, incendiaries, vicious, dishonest, and corrupt persons, such as may endanger the morals, health, or property of its people. This whole subject is necessarily connected with the internal police of a State, no item of which has, to any extent, been delegated to Congress, and every branch of which has been excepted to the prohibitions on the States, and is of course included in the reserved rights and powers of the States. In the remarks which I have submitted, Mr. President, I should not do justice to myself, or to Judge Baldwin, of the Supreme bench, were I not here to acknowledge my indebtedness to that able jurist and sound expositor of constitutional law, for having published his views upon the Constitution of the United States, from which work I have derived much aid in the formation and expression of the opinions which I have presented to the Senate on this occasion. The judicial decisions of Judge Baldwin, it is believed, will go to sustain the doctrines which I have advanced.

It only remains for me to ask that these resolutions, together with the correspondence which I have referred to, may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS said that he did not rise to oppose any action which might be desired by the State of Georgia upon these resolutions, either by Congress or by that State, but to state some facts as he understood them, in addition to the statement of the Senator from Georgia. As he understood the question between Georgia and Maine, it had no relation to the right of Georgia to make such laws, and to execute them within her own limits, as might appear to that State just and proper, but to the question whether or not the persons charged were fugitives from justice. As he understood the facts, the persons sought to be delivered up to Georgia were the master and mate of a coasting vessel belonging to Maine, who had, in the usual course of their business, delivered a cargo at Savannah, and received a return cargo, and, in the usual course of business, left that port on their return to Maine; that, after being one or two days on their voyage homeward, a noise was heard in the forepart of the vessel, and, upon examination, the slave in question was discovered, and the captain pursued his voyage homeward, and upon his arrival at Thomaston, in Maine, where the vessel belonged, he was met by the owner, or agents of the owner of the slave, who, without warrant or other process, took the slave into custody, and returned him to the owner in Georgia.

Under such circumstances the demand upon the Governor of Maine was made and repeated, for the delivery of Philbrook and Killeran as fugitives from justice. The Governor of Maine, not deeming them, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, to be fugitives from justice according to the true construction of the Constitution and laws upon that subject, had declined to deliver up those persons to be transported to Georgia upon the demand of the Governor of that State. While the Governor of Maine had duties to perform to sister States, he had also duties to perform to the citizens of his own State; and it should be known that the persons charged were men of small means, and illy able to bear the expense and sacrifices incident to their removal to Georgia, and carrying with them, as witnesses, all the crew of the vessel in which the slave was found, which would be indispensable to establish their innocence and obtain an acquittal upon their trial. It was under such circumstances that the Governor of Maine had declined to deliver up the persons demanded by the Governor of Georgia; and can it be said that, in so doing, he has disregarded his official duty? If, however, further legislation upon this delicate subject can have a tendency to define and render the duties of the Governors of the several States more clear and certain than they now are, he could have no objection to its being done; and hence he had no objection to the reference of the resolutions as asked by the Senator from Georgia.

After some very eloquent and animated remarks of Mr. CUTHBERT, and Mr. LUMPKIN, in reply,

The motion of Mr. L. to refer the resolutions to the Committee on the Judiciary, and to print, was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON presented a memorial from the Legislature of Mississippi, asking the reduction of the fees of the officers of the United States Court in that State to the standard established in the State courts; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from citizens of Pennsylvania, asking for the improvement of the navigation of Allegheny river; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Also, a memorial from citizens of Dauphin county, Pennsylvania, asking an increase of duties on foreign silk; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, a memorial from E. Littell, embracing a plan for the absorption of the banking capital of the country, without injury to the community; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a memorial remonstrating against bloodhounds; which was laid on the table.

Mr. WHITE presented a memorial from citizens of Wisconsin, asking for the improvement of Fox and Wisconsin rivers, and to construct a military road from Fort Howard to Fort Crawford, and to make Green Bay a port of entry; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. GRUNDY presented a memorial from the members of the bar of the Western District of Tennessee, asking for the holding of another term of the United States Court for that district; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALL presented a memorial from citizens of New Jersey, in relation to a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a petition from Conrad Waters, for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a memorial from citizens of Albany, against admitting Florida into the Union, unless slavery is abolished; the motion to receive which was laid on the table.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented the petition of citizens of the Parish of Rapides, Louisiana, asking a mail route on the Mississippi and Red rivers, as high as Alexandria or Natchitoches; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. KING presented the petition of A. C. Hollinger, asking remuneration for services; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented the petition of John Barnard, administrator on the estate of John Barclay Flemming, late purser in the navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented the memorial of citizens of Washington, remonstrating against the surrender of the United States stock to the State of Maryland; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. BENTON presented a memorial from citizens of Washington, asking Congress to take such measures as will compel the banks of the District to fulfil their obligations to the public, by a resumption of specie payments; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judicary, reported A bill supplemental to an act entitled an act to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases, passed Feb. 24, 1839;

Also, a bill to enable the United States to discharge liens and incumbrances on any real estate which now is or hereafter may become the property of the United States;

Also, a bill to regulate the legal proceedings, and to provide for the more speedy trial of cases in the Circuit Courts of the United States for the district of Michigan; which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. BENTON, was taken up and adopted.

Mr. KNIGHT, after some preparatory remarks, in opposition to the propositions of Mr. CALHOUN, on the effects of the protective policy, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of bringing in a bill declaring that the act of March, 1833, releasing from duty bleached and unbleached linens, table linens, linen napkins, and linen cambrics, and worsted stuff-goods, shawls, and other manufactures of silk, or of which silk is a component part, of chief value, coming from this side of the Cape of Good Hope, except sewing silk, shall not be so construed as to include umbrellas and parasols.

Mr. CALHOUN replied to the remarks of Mr. KNIGHT, and the resolution (being one of inquiry merely,) was agreed to.

Mr. SOUTHARD submitted the following.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War inform the Senate what is the present state of the difficulties which have existed, and the arrangements made, or attempted to be made, between the Government and the Cherokee people; and that he communicate to the Senate the papers, documents, and written communications which have passed between the War Department and its agents, and the said Cherokees and their chiefs, together with such additional information as he may have received since his last report on the subject.

The bill for the relief of John P. Bispham was considered in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed.

The bills ordered to be engrossed yesterday were severally read a third time, and passed.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business,

And then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, March 11, 1840.

Mr. RUSSELL rose to a correction of the journal. The proposition he moved on yesterday was, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] be "required" to vote. The word "compelled," I find, is used in the record. He wished to correct it in this particular.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said he understood distinctly that the word "compelled" was in the resolution, and he asked at the time by what process the House would compel a member to vote. He had no objection, however, to the amendment.

After a few words from Mr. R. the question was taken, and the journal was amended as indicated above.

The SPEAKER called the committees for reports; when

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, from the Committee of Elections, made a report from that committee, embracing all the testimony before it, with its journal of proceedings, in relation to the New Jersey disputed election, accompanied by a resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the papers enumerated in the foregoing list, and the journal of the Committee of Elections in the New Jersey case, comprising its proceedings up to the 5th instant, be printed for the use of the House and the committee.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved to amend the resolution to print, so as to include some additional evidence, which had been received since the former report of the committee had been made.

Mr. CAMPBELL felt himself called upon to say that the report and papers now moved to be printed by the committee, contained all the testimony and all the statements of the parties which had been laid before the committee previous to the adoption of the report. He thought, inasmuch as the other papers, which the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GARLAND] proposed to have presented, were never before the committee, it would be very irregular to do so, and especially as the question to which they related, had not been reported on by the committee.

Mr. C. inquired of the CHAIR whether it was in order to amend as proposed.

The CHAIR replied that it was in order to amend, as proposed by the gentleman from Louisiana, but that it would be in order so to amend as to call upon the committee for other testimony.

Mr. R. GARLAND then proposed to amend the resolution by adding thereto the following:

"And that said committee be instructed to report the evidence referred to it on the 6th instant, and that the same be printed;"

So as to include in the motion to print; the evidence recently received, and which had been referred to the committee on Friday.

Mr. DROMGOOLE inquired if the chairman of the Committee of Elections [Mr. CAMPBELL] whether he had reported to the House this evidence which it is proposed to print; and whether it is not a part of evidence that is now being taken for the purpose of purging the polls; and upon which the committee have yet to report under the resolution of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL replied that it had not been reported by the committee; and was a part of the evidence they have yet to act upon, with the view to determine the ultimate right to seats. It was not a part of the testimony on which the committee had decided the prima facie right to the return.

Mr. BOTTS begged leave to state that since the testimony was taken, there had been a meeting of the committee, called expressly for the purpose of considering it, and it refused to do so. He understood that this committee was discharged from the further consideration of the New Jersey question until such time as they should make application for their seats. He would vote that every particle of this evidence should be published. He did hope that the amendment would prevail, and that the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, should go to the country.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut did not understand that there was any necessity for the House making an order on the subject. If he was not mistaken, the House had already authorized the committee to publish all the papers which it might see fit to have published. He wished to throw no obstacle in the way of printing, if it was thought necessary and proper to print. At one stage of this question, it had been his desire that all the papers and testimony should be printed, and laid before the House, to enable it to act understandingly on the question which was decided on yesterday. Since the question had been decided before the testimony was printed, he had become totally indifferent whether it be now printed or not. The House should understand that there was connected with the report of the majority of the committee only a part of the testimony, viz: so much of it as the chairman might deem material in order to support the report; and now the chairman had moved to print the residue. In this way the whole of the testimony would come before the House; a part of it connected with the report, and a part not. No portion of this latter part of the evidence had been read in the House or printed, but the House had been brought up to the question without a single man knowing what the testimony did contain. Now, after a decision had been had in the dark, and the proof had not even been read, it was proposed to print it; and to what purpose? A considerable portion of the proof was referred to in the report of the majority, and a considerable portion of what was now proposed to be printed had been rejected by the committee, as would appear from their journal, on the ground of defect in the time of notice. As to the new depositions alluded to in the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, it was merely a substitute for what had been before defective in form. Mr. S. said he had no objection to the printing, provided the testimony and journal were to be printed entire; but he claimed that the bundle of testimony recently referred to the committee by the House should be printed along with the rest.

Mr. RIVES observed that the minds of gentlemen, it seemed, had undergone a very great change within a day or two past. He hoped that it would be recollected by the House that more than a fortnight ago, he made the proposition that all the papers on this question should be printed for the use of the members of the House. He had made this proposition a fortnight ago, after having informed the gentlemen associated with him on the committee of his intention of doing so, having failed to get the motion which he made in the committee carried, to instruct their chairman to move for the printing of these papers. This was refused. He went further. He made a motion to print, in the absence of the parties, who had gone on to New Jersey to take testimony, in pursuance of the resolution of the committee, all the testimony that had been taken, in order that it might be in possession of every member of this House, and that they might act with a full understanding of the subject, when the time limited by the committee should expire. This was also refused. He hoped the House would recollect that a few days afterwards the chairman of the committee [Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina] made a proposition to have all the papers bearing on the case, together with the report, printed. The chairman did not stop here. He also made a proposition to have other papers printed—papers connected with the issue to be tried by the House next April, when the parties return with the evidence purging the polls. What was the course of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH] on this motion? What was the course of the Opposition generally? They refused the printing of these papers. Not one of these gentlemen thought proper to trust the chairman of the committee with sufficient respect to print his report, with the evidence that he had collected. It would also be recollected, that on Friday last, in a becoming spirit of fairness, he submitted a motion to postpone the further consideration of this subject until Tuesday, making it the special order of the day, and to continue as such until disposed of; and, in the mean time, what further did he propose should be done? Why, that all the evidence on both sides should be printed. What did the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH] do? Did he, and those gentlemen who, with him, were the advocates of the great powers of the certificate and seal of the Governor of New Jersey to return members to this House—did they accept this fair and reasonable proposition? No, sir; they refused it. There were a few exceptions, to be sure, but very few of the Opposition would go with him and his friends to have these papers printed, and therefore they could not get a vote of two-thirds, which was necessary to have it done. Although we had a majority, said Mr. R. we had not two-thirds, and consequently could not get the printing ordered. He had been anxious from the beginning that all the facts in relation to this matter should be printed, so that the House might act understandingly, when it acted at all. But what was the course of gentlemen in the Opposition yesterday? His colleague [Mr. BOTTS] came forward with a proposition to let in the minority report, for the purpose of having it printed. This was before the report of the majority was acted on, and after the printing of it had been refused. Gentlemen then proposed to have this minority report acted on, when they had refused to print the report of the majority.

What did the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. R. GARLAND] propose to do now? Up to this time, for two weeks had that gentleman been voting against the printing of these papers for the purpose of getting information on a subject on which they were to act immediately, and yet this morning he desired to have printed matters connected with the issue to be settled, perhaps, some two or three months hence.

Mr. R. GARLAND replied that he would like the gentleman to show when he had voted against printing, save when the shameless proposition had been made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. C. JOHNSON,] to take the whole of the testimony out of the hands of the committee.

Mr. RIVES continued. It is very far from my intention to misrepresent any gentleman on this floor; and, if I am convinced that I do misrepresent, I retract what I have said. Have I (asked he) misrepresented the gentleman in saying that he refused to vote for a suspension of the rules to print these papers?

Mr. GARLAND said he had, when it was proposed to print only a part of the testimony, and such part as might suit the views of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. RIVES. Then I have not done the gentleman injustice. I have stated his course correctly; and yet he comes forward with a proposition to print papers that never were before the committee, and to print papers on which no action is to take place, till the parties return from New Jersey, after purging the polls. Can the gentleman complain about printing now? Can the House order these papers to be printed, without a disregard to its rules? Can it do so when the chairman of the committee has told you that these papers were not considered in committee, and were not, therefore, reported on? and this, too, in the absence of the parties litigant, who have gone on to New Jersey, under the authority of the committee, to collect counteracting testimony? Did the gentleman desire to forestall public opinion in relation to the facts stated in these papers, when the adverse party is in New Jersey, taking testimony to counteract them?

The SPEAKER requested the gentleman to suspend his remarks while he informed the gentleman from Louisiana that his motion was not in order while these papers were in possession of the committee.

Mr. R. GARLAND. Then I will modify my motion so as to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the papers.

Mr. RIVES said the gentleman had no right to make a motion of that kind at this time.

Mr. GARLAND. Very well; then I will make it as soon as it shall be in order.

Mr. RIVES continued. If it be the wish of gentlemen to recall the parties from New Jersey, and say that they will then try and determine this case on its merits with the evidence now in the possession of the House, then, said Mr. R. I will go with them. Mr. R. said he was desirous, with a majority of the committee that there should be a thorough investigation as to the legality of all the votes that had been given. He desired to see not only who received a majority of the votes that are prima facie good, but he desired to see who received a majority of legal votes after the canvass. He believed that under the laws of New Jersey, they were bound to receive as legal votes those votes which had been received as such by the officers of the State, legally constituted for that purpose. While gentlemen had abandoned the ground that they first took, that the House must receive the men who came with the Governor's certificates, because such certificates were issued by the Governor of a State, and raised a new issue some fifteen or sixteen months after the election had been held, he was willing to gratify them in it. That there was something wrong, he thought was evident by this new issue being raised. That some illegal votes had been taken on both sides he had no doubt, because he did not believe there ever was a Congressional election in which some illegal votes were not taken.

Mr. EVERETT here called Mr. R. to order for wandering from the questions before the House.

Mr. RIVES continued.

Did gentlemen, he asked, desire this evidence to be published? Did they desire evidence to be printed now, that was applicable to the issue that was to come up hereafter, and that has not been acted on by the committee? To this he was opposed. He would inform his colleague, if he desired the report of the minority to be printed, if he would lay it on the table, he would consent to print it with the other papers. But he presumed that his colleague would not consent to that course; because when, yesterday, there was a general consent to receive this report, and have it printed, there were objections made, not by one of the Administration party, but by one of those gentlemen who opposed the printing of the majority report. Mr. R. did not believe that the printing was moved by the gentleman from Louisiana was desirable at this time, for the reason that the House had disposed of the question, having decided that certain of the claimants were elected by the people of New Jersey, and that they should occupy the seats to which they had a right. His colleague [Mr. BOTTS] was mistaken in one thing in relation to what was done yesterday. That gentleman supposed that the question was finally settled, and that the contestors must make a new issue. Such was not the decision of the House. It was expressly reserved in the resolution that was adopted, that the parties litigant should continue to take testimony, for the purpose of purging the polls. Such was expressly his intention in voting for the resolution.

The SPEAKER here called Mr. R. to order for wandering from the question before the House.

Mr. R. said he wanted to show, in relation to this matter of printing, that a majority of the House was in favor of it from the beginning, but owing to the constitution of the body, they had failed in doing it, in consequence of the course of the Opposition, who had thus forced them to act on the subject previous to printing the papers. He had had advantages which others did not possess, of examining all this testimony, and he was therefore fully satisfied with what he had done.

Mr. R. GARLAND then moved to modify his motion, by inserting the words, "and also the evidence referred to the committee on the 6th instant, and that said committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same till after it is printed.

Mr. DROMGOOLE raised the question of order, whether it was competent for the gentleman to move the printing of papers not before the House, and pending a proposition to print papers that were before the House.

The SPEAKER suggested to the gentleman from Louisiana, that he could accomplish his object, by moving to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the testimony.

Mr. R. GARLAND here modified his motion accordingly.

Mr. GARLAND said the gentleman from Virginia endeavored to make the impression that we wished to suppress the publication of the testimony. Such was not the fact. He was opposed at that time, because it was forestalling the question. Mr. G. denounced the course the House had pursued in taking the subject out of the hands of the committee, after they had sent the contestants home to take testimony. That was the reason that he and the party with which he acted, objected then to publishing the testimony. He then, as now, believed it a direct violation of the order of the House referring the subject to the committee. Then it was that he and others refused to have any of it printed. The chairman representing a majority of the committee, did not come before the House with all the evidence; and as a proof of that fact, he made reference to the report this day presented by the chairman.

Mr. CAMPBELL rose to explain. The gentleman from Louisiana (he said) stated that the chairman of the committee came before the House, when he made his report, with only a part of the testimony. Mr. C. said he would inform the gentleman that the committee acted in strict conformity with the resolution of the 28th ultimo. That resolution directed the committee to report with regard to a certain fact, and to report also all the testimony connected with that fact. This was exactly what the committee did, and it was in strict conformity with the resolution of the 28th ultimo.

Mr. R. GARLAND still contended that all the testimony, at the time he objected to the printing, was not reported to the House; and, in support of that opinion, referred to the report made this morning. He did object to the printing, on the grounds before stated, until the whole of the evidence was reported. He was now in favor of having the whole of it printed, with the additional testimony since referred to the committee.

Mr. MEDILL said that he would answer the gentleman from Louisiana, if he would give way a moment for that purpose. The committee had acted in strict conformity with the resolution of the House. They had kept back nothing, but desired that the journal of their proceedings, with all the testimony, should be printed, and go to the public. The resolution of the 28th ult. as will be recollected, imposed two distinct duties on the committee—to report which five of the ten individuals claiming seats from New Jersey received the greatest number of lawful votes from the whole State, with all the evidence of that fact in their possession; and, ALSO, to report such papers, and so much of their proceedings as they wished to have printed by order of the House.

The House evidently contemplated separate reports. The committee, on determining which persons received a plurality of votes, as required to do by the resolution, directed their chairman to report the same to the House, accompanied with all such testimony as tended to establish that fact, and also to present to the House the journal of their proceedings, with all the papers and testimony in possession of the committee, and ask that the same be printed. It was not proper that the report, showing which persons had received a plurality of votes, should be burdened with the journal and certain other papers, which, in the opinion of the committee, were irrelevant to that issue. Even if mistaken in their opinion of what was relevant, in this particular no injustice or inconvenience could have resulted. It would have all been before the House for such further action as was deemed advisable and proper.

After submitting the report, the chairman asked him to present the journal and other papers, and being denied the privilege, moved a suspension of the rules, which was negatived by the votes of the gentleman and his friends. A member of the committee [Mr. RIVES] even moved to postpone the consideration of the resolution admitting the persons having a majority of the votes to their seats, to a day certain, that all the papers might be printed and laid before the House, and this was also rejected, chiefly by the same gentlemen. It will be seen, then, with what propriety it is contended that the chairman declined presenting the whole testimony. The course adopted was in strict conformity with the order of the House.

Mr. R. GARLAND asked if the committee took into consideration all the testimony which showed who had a majority of the lawful votes. He inferred that it did not.

Mr. CAMPBELL replied that the committee had considered all the testimony necessary to establish the prima facie right to seats.

Mr. R. GARLAND still contended that the committee had based their report on the certificate of the Secretary of State, without reference to the testimony, which went to show that there were illegal votes included in the aggregate in that certificate. There was no other conclusion from the course of things, but that the committee had acted on the certificate alone. He then complained that, after the question had been settled, it was now proposed to have all the testimony printed. Gentlemen might take their own course about it; but since the subject had been taken out of the hands of the committee, he hoped the whole would be printed.

Mr. JENIFER obtained the floor, and occupied the remainder of the morning hour in commenting on the proceedings of the commitee. He denounced them as highly censurable. In the course of his remarks, he was frequently corrected by Messrs. RIVES and MEDILL, members of the committee, as to matters of fact. [Mr. J's remarks were so indistinctly heard by the Reporters, that they have concluded not to publish a synopsis of them; and have withheld the replies of the other two gentlemen until such time as Mr. J. shall furnish them, when the whole will be published.]

The debate was here interrupted by Mr. J. W. JONES, who called for the orders of the day.

Mr. GRAVES rose for the purpose of getting the consent of the House, before passing to the orders, to permit him to reply to the reference which had been made to him in the course of the above debate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina objected. The gentleman had not been referred to in any manner which rendered it necessary for him to make an explanation.

The question was then taken on the motion to pass to the orders, and agreed to—ayes 102, noes not counted.

Mr. JENIFER inquired of the CHAIR whether he lost his right to the floor for to-morrow morning?

The CHAIR replied in the negative.

The SPEAKER then announced that the business before the House was the bill making appropriation to complete the removal of the raft of the Red river, and for other purposes, on which was pending three motions, viz: to refer, 1st, to the Committee on Roads and Canals; 2d, to the Committee on Commerce; and 3d, to the Committee of Ways and Means, with the following instructions, moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BIDDLE, to inquire and report to the House as follows:

1. Whether the advance of money by the Bank of Arkansas, which it is one of the objects of this bill to reimburse, was not made with full knowledge that the agent of the United States who effected the loan was acting in defiance of positive instructions from his superiors, as well as in the face of a known refusal by Congress to appropriate money to the work.

2. Whether the estimate on which the bill is founded was not made by the said agent prior to the closing up of the raft in August last; and whether any satisfactory data exist for computing the probable cost of removing the present impediments to navigation.

3. Whether the sum appropriated by this bill is called for in the estimates accompanying the President's message.

4. Whether the bill is not of such a character that it ought to have originated in this House.

The question being successively put on referring the bill to the Committee on Roads and Canals, on Commerce, and of Ways and Means, it was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The question then being on the instructions,

Mr. R. GARLAND demanded the yeas and nays on them; which were ordered, and were—yeas 130, nays 37.

So the instructions were adopted.

Various Senate bills lying on the SPEAKER's table were taken up, read twice, and appropriately referred.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

The act to provide for the collecting, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the public revenue, coming up on its reference, it was read twice, when

Mr. J. W. JONES moved to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means; and

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky moved to commit it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Upon this proposition, Mr. W. remarked, he proposed to submit a few observations. He said he would limit himself mainly to the isolated question of reference—reserving whatever he might desire to say upon the general merits of the bill, when it should come up for discussion in the Committee of the Whole. He asked what solid objection there was to the proposition of reference to the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union? He could not perceive any. Is it proposed to take away from the Committee of Ways and Means any of its appropriate and ordinary duties? He did not so understand it. He was not disposed to innovate upon the established order of business, or withhold from the Committee of Ways and Means any matters or propositions that legitimately belongs to that committee.

Mr. W. remarked, that whilst he was ready to aid in securing to all the standing committees their just rights, he was not incl ned quietly to sit by and see the entire business of the nation swept into the arms of the standing committees. Mr. W. said it would be recollected that the principal standing committees were emphatically Executive Committees. A decided majority of the members of said committees selected, because of the acknowledged approval of the great and leading measures of the Administration. Of this, he would not stop to complain—perhaps it was right it should be so; but the existence of such a fact certainly, authorized a rigid restriction of said committees to their proper and legitimate duties. Mr. W. said the very object and exclusive purpose of standing comittees was to take charge of the usual and ordinary business of this House. He observed that, according to well settled parliamentary practice and according to the uniform usage in legislation in this body, until within a very few years past, all propositions of an extraordinary character, all matters of great concernment, to speak in parliamentary language, and a especially a measure like the one now under consideration, involving n t simply the revenues—the finances of the Government; but effecting for weal or woe, for good or evil, the currency, commerce, agriculture, manufactures, and every ramification of business of this entire country, peculiarly demand to be referred, debated, and matured in the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union.

But again, said Mr. W. if none of the reasons urged existed in favor of his proposed reference of this bill, convenience and expediency recommend the preference of his proposition. It is well known to every member of the House, that the standing committees have quite as much business of the ordinary character as they are able to discharge; and especially the Committee of Ways and Means, the regular duties of which are onerous in the extreme. Mr. W. asked if there was any thing new or unusual in the proposition he had made? He contended there was not; so far from it, any other reference, he insisted, would be a departure from the established usage of this House, from the beginning of the Government to the opening of this Administration. He said if the journals of this House were examined, it would be found that at two periods in the history of this country—if not in all respects similar, certainly in very many things similar to the present—the magnitude of the crisis was considered so great, and the measures of redress so weighty, that special committees were raised, as a matter of course, without opposition, chosen from the first talents of the House, to whom were referred the propositions of the nature now proposed to be referred to the standing Committee of Ways and Means. In the year 1791, when the finances of this Government were greatly embarrassed—the currency depreciated—commerce suspended—public and private credit greatly depressed—this course was adopted. In 1814-15, a crisis very similar to the present, the same course was pursued by this House in each successive year? And was it so ordered at those periods, asked Mr. WHITE, because of any distrust of the want of intelligence or financial ability in the members of the standing committees of those days? No, sir; go and read the names of the distinguished individuals who composed the standing committees of Ways and Means at the periods alluded to; and there is no circle of greatness that can be drawn around the present chairman and his associates upon said committees, from which they could justly be excluded. He said this, not by way of invidious comparison, but to repudiate the idea that it would reflect any disparagement either upon the intelligence or integrity of the present Committee of Ways and Means to make the reference proposed. Mr. W. said he did not controvert, that, at the called session of '37, the topics now proposed to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, were referred to the standing Committee of Ways and Means, and that the precedent then set had been followed since that period. Yet, he contended, the precedent was a departure from the established usage of legislation in this House, and nothing, in his judgment, but the peculiar circumstances of the case, would have carried its adoption.

He said it would be recollected, no business of an ordinary character was acted upon during that session; nothing but the "grave and weighty matters," for which that extraordinary Congress was called; and so far from the fact that the Committee of Ways and Means having had charge of the matters contained in this bill at the called session, being an argument in favor of a similar reference now, to his mind it was a vital objection.

The majority of that committee now now entertain the same sentiments with the majority at the special session, who reported upon the propositions contained in this bill. The bill now before the House is, in substance, the same bill reported then. This bill (said Mr. W.) had been manufactured by the Committee of Finance in the Senate, peculiarly an Executive Committee, hurried through that body, he would say (if it would not subject him to be called to order) with unexampled haste, to effect purposes not of the the most patriotic character. Why, then, he asked, go through the idle formality of referring this bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, if immediate action is intended upon it? Why has the honorable chairman permitted it to slumber upon your table for six long weeks, without an effort even to call it up—to have it referred or printed? Is it intimated that the committee propose to make any alteration in said bill? cross a T, or dot an I? No such purpose is avowed. Why, then, this circuitous proposition, of reference to the Committee of Ways and Means? If speedy action be the wish of the friends of this measure, why not let the bill go directly to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where it will be open to amendment and for discussion? Were the friends of this measure waiting for political contingencies? Were they waiting for a prosperous commercial revulsion? Were they waiting to shape the features of this bill as political expediency may dictate, some weeks or months hence? Mr. W. said he knew very well all such objects or intentions would be repudiated and scouted with a flourish of trumpets, with a holy horror. But will not the country look to the actions of gentlemen, rather than their declarations? Are there any elections to take place in the course of a few weeks, the result of which might make it advisable for the good of the country, and if not for the good of the country, for the safety of the Administration, to let this bill sleep in the arms of the Committee of Ways and Means the sleep of death? or, if passed, passed with radical modifications?

If the friends of this measure sincerely desire its passage, why delay? why procrastinate? The Administration have an undisputed majority in both Houses. If this bill be the political panacea that its friends profess it is, in the name of high Heaven, why delay the remedy for one hour? Is the patient not sufficiently afflicted? Is not the disease universal, commencing here at the centre, paralyzing the Government revenues, extending to every branch of business, affecting every class of society, the merchant, manufacturer, mechanic, and farmer, leaving not a green spot of prosperity upon the broad map of this country, to rest the wearied eye from scenes of distress and suffering? If this bill be the grand specific, the infallible remedy, why not administer it at once? Having the undisputed power to pass it forthwith, why keep a suffering people any longer in a state of cruel suspense? Are we not told by the President, in his annual message, that the "continued agitation of this question injuriously affects the business of the country?" Sir, (said Mr. W.) if it is to pass, let it pass, and pass quickly, —with all its blessings, if its advocates are right—with all its miseries, if its opponents are not deceived.

But, Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. W.) I promised, in the beginning of my remarks, not to go into the merits of this bill. He would redeem his promise, and conclude, with the hope that the proposition of reference, moved by him, would be sustained by the House.

Mr. RHETT would merely call the attention of the House to the purposes for which the Committee of Ways and Means was constituted. Mr. R. then read from the rules of the House the following rule:

"It shall be the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to take into consideration all reports of the Treasury Department, and all such propositions relative to the revenue as may be referred to them by the House."

Now the gentleman had said very correctly that this subject was of great importance to the whole country. This, though true, was only so in reference to the manner in which the revenue shall be collected and disbursed—a subject which at all times belonged to the Committee of Ways and Means. In conformity with this view, all bills affecting the revenue had come from the Committee of Ways and Means. So also in relation to banks, which had the custody of the public revenue.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky said the gentleman was mistaken; the last bill for the charter of the Bank of the United States came from the Senate.

Mr. RHETT stood corrected. The Bank charter of 1816 did, he believed, come from the Committee of Ways and Means; but in this he might be mistaken—he was not particular. But whether it was so or not, he submitted to the gentleman if the Committee of Ways and Means had not the subject under consideration. When it came from the Senate it was sent to the Committee of Ways and Means. This was not the case with regard to this bill, for the Committee of Ways and Means had not yet had it under consideration. Was there any measure, he would ask, of great importance, that was not referred either to one of the standing committees, or to a select committee, before it was acted on in Committee of the Whole? After this bill should be examined by the Committee of Ways and Means, it would, as a matter of course, be taken up and fully discussed in Committee of the Whole. This was his desire, and he also understood it to be the desire of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. EVERETT would inquire of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if there were appropriations in this bill which would render it necessary that it should go to his committee.

Mr. JONES of Virginia considered that every bill of importance should be referred to its appropriate standing committee before acting on it in the House.

Mr. EVERETT said he wished to move instructions to the committee to amend this bill so as to cure it of some of its most material defects. All the bills on this subject, reported since 1837, contain within themselves provisions under which the Sub-Treasury might be converted into a bank of discount as well as a bank of circulation. The object, therefore, of his proposed instructions was, to test this question at the outset, and get the yeas and nays on it, which he feared he might not be able to do at a subsequent stage of the proceedings. Every bill which had been reported on this subject gave the Treasury the power to transfer the moneys of the Government from one place to another, without pointing out the mode in which these transfers shall be made. It also gives the power to pay the debts of the Government without pointing out how these debts shall be paid. All, then, that was necessary to convert this Sub Treasury into a bank of discount was simply to purchase a draft on New Orleans, receive the securities of the individual in payment, and make this draft receivable in payment of duties. Then, in order to make it a bank of circulation, all that was necessary was that when a creditor of the Government wanted his money at a particular place, say at Philadelphia, pay him in ten dollar drafts. Mr. E. said he could not imagine that this bill was intended for the mere purpose of safe keeping the public revenue, for the Government had no money to keep, and he could not, therefore, conceive why the Administration was so anxious for this measure, unless for ulterior objects. When there were no banks in the country for the merchants, the calculation of the Administration must be that the merchants must be dependent for their facilities on the Government. Then, (said Mr. E.) when you have got a bank of discount and circulation, and extended under a set of Government directors throughout the States of the Union, just look at the tremendous political power it will possess; when you can say who shall have loans and who shall not, who can measure the extent of the power. It would be in vain, then, to struggle against it.

Mr. E. in illustration of his argument, referred to the history of a State bank in his own State, established, he said, in Democratic times. He wished to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to this subject, and ask him if such would not be the effect if the Government was permitted to purchase drafts without any limitation. It was for the purpose of testing these questions that he submitted his motion of instructions. Mr. E. then moved to instruct the committee to amend the bill by inserting the following provisions:

"That whenever it shall be necessary to place moneys appropriated at the disposal of any disbursing officer, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause a Treasury warrant to be issued, directing the Treasurer, or Receiver General, or a Treasurer of the Mint, to place the sum required to the credit of such disbursing officer.

"That whenever it shall be necessary to transfer money from the Treasurer, from a Receiver General, or Treasurer of the Mint, to another Receiver General or Treasurer of the Mint, or from either to the Treasurer, in case it be inconvenient to make such transfer in specie, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause transfer drafts to be issued in sums not less than one thousand dollars each, payable to the order of the Treasurer, Receiver General, or Treasurer of a Mint to whom the money is to be transferred, and to transmit the same to him, who shall cause the same to be sold at his office after three days' public notice, for cash in hand only, and on such sale he shall endorse upon such draft the day of such sale, the amount for which it was sold, and the day on which it is made payable, which shall be after ten days, and within ninety days from its day of date; provided the sale shall be made at a greater discount than five per cent.

"That all payments to the creditors of the the United States shall be made at the Treasury, or under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, by drafts drawn upon such Receiver General or Treasurer of one of said Mints, as the creditor shall designate, payable to the creditor at such day, after ten days and within ninety days from date; and such drafts shall be for the entire sum found due and payable to such creditor, unless such sum shall exceed two thousand dollars, in which case it shall be lawful to issue several drafts, provided that no one of them shall be for a less sum than one thousand dollars. And if any such transfer draft or Treasury draft shall not be presented for payment, at the office at which it is payable by the day specified thereon for payment, the payment thereof shall be suspended for three months from the day on which it shall be presented. And if any transfer or other draft, presented for payment of the day on which it was made payable, or at the expiration of said three months, shall be protested for non-payment, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the return of such transfer draft or Treasury draft, to cause the amount thereof, with ten per centum for damages, to be paid to the holder of such transfer draft or Treasury draft.

"And that said committee be further instructed to inquire and report whether the bill is not of such a character that it ought to have originated in this House."

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina had been anxious, during the whole session, to know when this subject would come up for discussion, in order that he might make some remarks in regard to it. He was, therefore, decidedly in favor of this discussion coming up immediately, and the Committee of the Whole certainly was as competent as the Committee of Ways and Means to consider the subject. He could not but wonder at this measure being so long delayed, and that it was now purposed to send it to sleep, in the room of the Committee of Ways and Means, and then to be referred to the Committee of the Whole House. This looked very much like a fest to have this measure discussed in the House. He had, like Hannibal, when he vowed eternal enmity to the Romans, vowed to oppose this measure, which he deemed so hostile to the interests and liberties of the country.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he would not have risen to participate in this discussion, had it not, on this and on former occasions, been insinuated here, that there was a disposition on the part of the friends of the Administration to give the bill under consideration the "go by." The bill had, to be sure, laid upon the SPEAKER's table for the last six weeks or more; but this was the first time it had ever been reached in the order of business. He was glad that he had the opportunity of so telling the American people, for constant and innumerable were the inquiries addressed to him and others who were supposed to be friendly to the bill, "Why is not the Sub-Treasury bill taken up?" And now he would avail himself of the opportunity of saying, that it had not before been taken up and considered, because it had not before been reached. The New Jersey question and other subjects had, according to the order of business as prescribed by our rules, had precedence of it. Let not gentlemen of the Opposition "lay the flattering unction to their souls," that there is a disposition on the part of the friends of the Administration here to let this bill sleep the sleep of death. Nor averse as he was to remain here during the torrid months of summer, he would remain till September next, if such a sacrifice of personal comfort should prove necessary to procure the passage of this bill. Gentlemen of the Opposition seemed impatient for the onset. They seemed to affect or feel a fear that they would not have the opportunity of fulminating their anathemas against this bill. He implored them to be a little patient. He assured them that a chance would yet be afforded them to pour out against this great measure of reform oceans of those speeches which they supposed possessed such magical influence. The Democracy here understood too well, and felt too forcibly its duty, not to make every possible exertion in favor of this great principle of divorce between the Government and the banks, to permit the bill on the table to lie without prompt and decisive action. He regarded it as the great measure of the session, called for not less by the highest interests of the country, than by a majority of the American people. He feared not discussion. The measure had never suffered, it never would suffer, from discussion, as its past history abundantly proved; and he was not a little surprised that a conviction of this truth had not already so strongly seized the mind of gentlemen, as to weaken their confidence in their ability to make any thing by the further discussion of this subject. To the popular mind, it had grown brighter from discussion. When first proposed, the people were frightened by the "gorgons and hydras," held up to their vision by political orators, as likely to emanate from this measure. The senseless cry of one currency for the Government, and another currency for the people had, at first, had the effect of frightening many honest men, but had been so often and so triumphantly refuted, that he could hardly believe that it would now be deemed worthy of repetition here. When honorable gentlemen recollected that State after State had, under the first impulse of alarm created by this measure, broken away from the Administration; but that reason and discussion had brought most of them back to their first love, they could hardly imagine that, after the cheering expression of that "sober second thought," which had given us a majority on this floor contrary to the general expectation entertained a year ago, we would shrink from the further support and prosecution of this great and salutary measure. The people, at least that portion of the people that elected that majority, anxiously awaited the passage of this bill, and that majority would be recreant to its duty, if it did not struggle long and late, if need be, to secure its passage.

He would add another word or two upon the propositions to commit the bill. One was to commit it to the Committe of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the other to commit it to the Committee of Ways and Means. All admitted its great importance; it contained many sections involving new and highly important provisions, and he had heard no good reason urged against referring it to one of the standing committees of the House. Every bill from the Senate, however unimportant its provisions, was usually referred to one of the standing committees, and why should there be a departure from our practice in reference to this great measure. Standing committees were created, because, from the limited number that composed them, were more competent to deliberate with care, to detect faults, and propose the necessary amendments, than was a body of men large as that here assembled. The very speech of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] showed the necessity of referring it to one of the standing committees of the House. He sees a huge Government bank lurking in some of its provisions. It was then peculiarly proper that one of the standing committees of the House should look into it, and see whether it in truth contained such a formidable monster. There was nothing, he admitted, in the rules of the House which ex vi termini brought it within the jurisdiction of the Committee of Ways and Means; but relating as it did to finance, it was, in reference to it, the most appropriate of all the standing committees. He (Mr. V.) was an humble member of that committee, and he would assure gentlemen, that so far as he was concerned, there would, if referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, be no unnecessary delay. His motto in regard to it, here and elsewhere, would be "ACTION, PROMPT, AND EFFICIENT ACTION."

Mr. WISE would ask his colleague if any bill on the subject of the Sub-Treasury had been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said he would answer his colleague, that no bill had been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means on this subject, for the reason that they had had this bill on the table for five or six weeks; and that he had been anxious every day since its reception to get it up, but had not, until now, had an opportunity of doing so. He would ask permission of the House to say, in addition, that he would use his most earnest endeavors to obtain a speedy action on it in the Committee of the Whole, and to get it as speedily as possible before the House. He had hoped to receive the co-operation of gentlemen who were politically opposed to him, in the immediate reference of the bill, as by this means the action of the House on it would be hastened; and he very much regretted the motions which had been made, and which were likely to create a further delay.

Mr. WISE further inquired of the chairman [Mr. JONES] whether the Committee of Ways and Means had any measure of its own under consideration in favor of the Sub-Treasury bill.

Mr. JONES replied in the negative, for the reason that the subject had not been brought to their attention. It would be recollected that more than a month had expired before the House was organized, and the committee appointed. The appropriation bills, and other important matters, had occupied the time of the committee, since its appointment, until within a short time past; and there being a great amount of other important business before them, and having this bill on the SPEAKERS table, it was supposed by him that there would have been but little delay in getting it before the House, that they could, in the meantime, attend to that business. They have not, until now, had an opportunity to take this bill up for reference.

Mr. WISE said, with the country in an unexampled state of depression, there ought to have been no reason for the delay of the committee to consider and report a measure of relief. The committee had not even considered this great panecea for all the evils which now effect the people He contended that they should have had the subject under consideration without reference to the bill on the SPEAKER's table. This bill, which had slipped through the Senate, might have been concocted in the Executive chamber; and they should not have waited for it. He felt great anxiety to expedite the bill, and give the relief which the friends of the bill contend it will afford. The people in agony call for relief, and he trusted something would be done to grant it. He would not at that time agree to discuss the bill with any one, but when the proper time came he would be disposed to do so. The House was now just organized, and the Administration party have acquired their full majority, and he and the country would hold them responsible for the passage of the Sub-Treasury, or some measure of relief He would say to his constituents and to the country, and now pledge himself that if the gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] would vote for the Sub-Treasury bill—the specie Sub-Treasury bill promised a duped people—he would vote for it. He would rather lose his right arm than inflict his constituents with the passage of this measure. He would not have dared to make the pledge if he thought the gentleman and his party would meet him; but he had no fears that he would ever be called on to vote for such a bill. He threw out the challenge because he believed the Administration had no desire to pass a specie Sub-Treasury bill, such as had been promised. He suggested to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] the propriety of so modifying his instructions as not to make it imperative.

Mr. EVERETT then modified his amendment so as to authorize the committee to inquire into the expediency of engrafting it on the bill.

Mr. CRABB looked upon it as a perfect mockery to send this bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, as there was not a member on this floor who had not come here with a perfect knowledge of the subject, and with his mind fully made up on it. His right to sit and speak here was more dependent on his decided and unequivocal opposition to this favorite measure of the Administration than to any merits of his own. He was as ready now as he ever could be to speak his opposition to this bill, and every other bill of a similar character, and he presumed every gentleman was ready to do the same. Why refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means? Was the object delay? Gentlemen pretended that the Opposition in this House had thrown obstructions in the way of this bill, as they have been accused of doing with regard to every other. But gentlemen must recollect that we have an excuse. He had said some time ago that it was thought necessary by the Administration party that these five New Jersey members should be voted in before the passage of this bill. Yesterday the deed was done, and to-day this great measure, in which the Administration have pledged themselves, and with which its most distinguished members say that they are willing to sink or swim, should be taken up and discussed on its merits. I, for one, said Mr. C. say, if you pass it, pass it to-day. I wish to see its effects. It affected entire interests of the country, for there was not an interest that would not be deeply injured by it. Let it go, then, to the Committee of the Whole, in which all the various important interests of the country are represented, and can speak of the injuries it will inflict on them. The Committee of the Whole was the most appropriate for it. Let it be discussed there. Let the bill pass, and let the House adjourn, for, from present prospects, he foresaw that Congress could do nothing this session. Every question was made a party one; every question had reference to who should occupy the White House. He desired, for one, to go home. Let gentlemen unite with him in taking up this great measure, and they could soon do so.

Mr. PETRIKIN said he did not rise to make a speech, but to make a motion to save the time of the House and the country. Before making that motion, he would assign some reasons for the causes of the delay complained of by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CRABB] before him, and the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.] Mr. Speaker, we have been compelled to sit here, day after day and week after week, to hear gentlemen of the Opposition delivering speeches, not relevant to the merits of the questions before the House for consideration, but endeavoring to make Harrison capital for the next Presidential election, and endeavoring to make the people believe Gen. Harrison was that which he was not, nor never could be made—a hero, a statesman, and a philosopher. You have also, Mr. Speaker, heard the gentleman and his Whig friends on this floor, day after day, complaining of the Democratic party cutting off debate by the previous question, or, to use their own term, applying "the gag law," to prevent discussion and the freedom of debate. Why, sir, it was but a day or two since that I was personified as being obnoxious to the charge of moving this—to our loquacious Whigs—terrible gag law, or previous question. It really does not appear very consistent in those gentlemen whose daily avocation it has been to "stave off" the business of the country and prevent its being reached and considered, to get up now and complain of this or any other bill not being reached. I shall now (Mr. P. observed) conclude—and I have no doubt, in doing so, I shall disappoint some dozen of Whig orators—by moving the previous question.

The previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be taken.

And the main question, being first on commitment to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided as follows: yeas 77, nays 115.

So the motion was rejected.

And the question recurring on the motion to commit to the Committee of Ways and Means, it was decided in the affirmative, without a division.

So the bill was committed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

And the question then recurring on the instructions of Mr. EVERETT,

Mr. PETRIKIN asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 81, nays 106.

So the House refused to adopt the instructions.

On motion of Mr. WISE, and by general consent, the bill was ordered to be printed.

A number of other bills on the SPEAKER's table were put on the first and second reading, and were appropriately referred.

The bill providing for the removal of the location of the land office in the State of Mississippi; and

The bill allowing further time to the Trustees of Centre College, at Danville, in Kentucky, to dispose of lands heretofore granted to the Deaf and Dumb Society; were severally read a third time, and passed.

The bill heretofore introduced on leave, by Mr. BELL, to secure the fredom of elections, and to prevent the interference of Executive officers therin, coming up in its order, and the question being "Shall the bill be rejected?"

Mr. BELL said he did not wish to detain the House at this time with any remarks; but he would say that he considered this bill of the utmost importance; of greater importance, in his judgment, (though, perhaps, he might view it with a partiality which other gentlemen did not feel,) than even the Sub-Treasury bill. And as an opportunity had thus been afforded to him of making remarks which, under other circumstances, he scarcely could have hoped to have had the privilege of making, and as he had wished that the bill might be discussed on both sides of the House, he hoped it would be the pleasure of the House that it should lie over until such time as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] had had time to pass his Treasury note bill.

Some conversation as to the order of business here took place between the SPEAKER and Mr. BELL, and the SPEAKER having decided that this bill would take precedence of all business of its class on the SPEAKER's table,

Mr. BELL said he would not then address the House, but consent to an adjournment; whereupon,

On motion of Mr. MASON,

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, March 12, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a message from the President of the United States in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 4th of February, transmitting copies of correspondence between the Department of War and Governor Call concerning the war in Florida; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANDERSON presented a memorial of Clements, Bryan and Company, contractors with the Government for the supply of the emigrating Cherokees, praying the passage of an act authorizing the Secretary of War to adjust and settle their claims upon just and equitable principles. Mr. A explained at some length the merits of the claim, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TAPPAN presented a memorial of citizens of Waterville, Lucas county, Ohio, praying for a reduction of postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of James W. Hale and Joseph Francis, praying the aid of Government to enable them to erect a permanent life-boat station on Rockaway beach, for the relief of distressed vessels; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALLEN presented a memorial of citizens of Washington, praying that Congress may take such measures as will compel the banks chartered by them to fulfil their obligations to the public, by a resumption of specie payments.

Mr. A. said he was not personally acquainted with the citizens whose names were affixed to this memorial, but he was informed they were respectable men, and embraced members of both political parties. He asked that the memorial might be read, and ordered to be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. STURGEON presented a memorial of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the improvement of the Alleghany river from Pittsburgh to Hamilton, in the State of New York; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. DAVIS presented a memorial of citizens of New York, praying that certain duties paid on silk twist may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. D. also presented a memorial of citizens of Wisconsin, praying for the construction of certain military roads, for the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, and for establishing a port of entry at Green Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. D. also presented a memorial of C. B. Dickman; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LUMPKIN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the petition of John Scott, reported a bill for the relief of his legal representatives; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill to regulate the pay and emoluments of pursers in the navy, reported the same with an amendment, and a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the claim of Thomas B. Parsons; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the claim of Joseph Whipple; which was agreed to.

Mr. FULTON, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill in relation to donations of land to certain persons in the State of Arkansas; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The motion submitted yesterday by Mr. SOUTHARD was considered and agreed to.

On motion by Mr. TAPPAN, the bill regulating bank issues in the District of Columbia was taken up for the purpose of offering some amendments, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be printed, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

MILITARY AND NAVAL PREPARATIONS.

The following resolution was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if, in his judgment, compatible with the public interest, all the information which may be in the possession of the Government, or which can be conveniently obtained, of the military and naval preparations of the British authorities on the Northern frontier of the United States, from Lake Superior to the Atlantic ocean; distinguishing the permanent from the temporary and field works, and particularly noting those which are within the claimed limits of the United States.

Mr. NORVELL rose and said, that he had submitted this resolution, from a strong sense of duty. His firm conviction was, and had a long time been, that the period had arrived when preparations of a military and naval character on one side of our Northern frontier, ought to be met by corresponding preparations on the other side. While the British Government was amusing us with negotiation, as Philip amused the Athenians it was making quiet and steady progress in preparing for offensive and defensive operations, at all important points near the entire frontier of the United States, from Maine to Lake Superior. While England was active, we were slumbering at our posts, unarmed, and without defence. It was time for us to awake from this dangerous repose. It was time for us to learn the whole extent of our hazardous situation.

The late correspondence between the Secretary of State and the British Envoy, with the information which accompanied it, clearly showed that the British authorities had deviated from the arrangement made by the Governors of Maine and New Brunswick, through the interposition of General Scott, despatched to that quarter for that purpose by the President. The explanations of the British Minister appeared to him to be evasive, perhaps unintentionally so. He seemed to have avoided the true issue—the violation of the arrangement to which he had just adverted. The Secretary of State, in his letter to Mr. Fox, remarks: "That the extensive accommodations prepared and preparing, at an old and at new stations, the works finished, and in the course of construction, on the land and on the water, are not in harmony with the assurance that the only object is the preservation of a few unimportant buildings and store-houses for the temporary protection of the number of troops her Majesty's ordinary service can require to pass on the road from New Brunswick to Canada."

And now, sir, what is the answer of the British Minister? After general declarations and disavowals on the subject of preparations, he adds:

"The fact, shortly, is, and this is the essential point of the argument, that her Majesty's authorities have not as yet altered their state of preparation, or strengthened their military means within the disputed territory, with a view to settling the question of the boundary, although the attitude assumed by the State of Maine, with the reference to that question, would be a clear justification of such measures; and it is much to be apprehended that the adoption of such measures will sooner or later become indispensable, if the people of Maine be not compelled to desist from the extensive system of armed aggression which they are continuing to carry on in other parts of the same disputed territory."

Now, sir, here is no disclaimer of the fact, that the state of preparation has not been altered; that the military means of the British have not been strengthened within the disputed territory. It is simply declared that this alteration has not been made; that these military means have not been strengthened, "with a view to settling the question of the boundary." The menace is thrown out, too, that the attitude of Maine may render such measures indispensable on the part of the British, with a view to that boundary question, if the people of that State be not compelled to desist from the armed aggressions which they continue to carry on within the disputed territory. The disclaimer of the minister goes to the motive, and not to the fact of increased military preparations.

And then, sir, do we not all know that a proposition on the part of our Government, for the settlement of the boundary question, by commissioners, has been before the British cabinet for some seven or eight months, and that no satisfactory response has yet been received to that proposition? Was not this proof presumptive that delays and postponements had been purposely interposed, until the means should be prepared for a coercive adjustment of the boundary question, on the terms which the British Government might prescribe?

Again, sir: it had been stated, with what truth he could not tell, that the cabinet of St. James had written to its agents in Canada, that the passage from New Brunswick to Quebec ought to be, and must be, rendered open and free by either amicable or forcible means.

What did all this indicate? Were these preparations, these imputed declarations, intended to intimidate us into a submission to the conditions of settling the boundary question, which might be presented to us by the adverse party?

Along the whole line of Lake Ontario, it had been stated that new military works were in the progress of construction, and that the old works were in a course of being strengthened. The military posts at Molden had also, as he had learned, been rendered stronger. White Wood island, which had been many years ago most unfortunately ceded to the British, was, as he had been informed in letters, fortified, or about to be fortified. That island was in the river Detroit, near its mouth; and, with a powerful battery, it would command the passage of both the American and British channels of the river, and lay the whole of the upper Lake country, with its important military posts, its flourishing cities and villages, at the mercy of an enemy. Military works were constructed, or constructing, at Sandwich and Windsor, immediately opposite to Detroit; and that prosperous city could, from these works, in one hour, be laid in ashes. And what was the state of defensive military preparation on our side, in that quarter? Why, sir, we had not even the benefit of public barracks for the protection and accommodation of the miserable skeletons of companies which were stationed there. The commanding officers were compelled to rent a house at the water's edge for their accommodation. Sir, the surrender of White Wood island to the British was a most unwise measure. Its acquisition by that Government showed its sagacious forecast, as its cession remonstrated our want of that quality, in a most fatal degree. It ought never to have been given up.

He had been told that the British authorities were building one or two steam frigates on Lake Ontario and Lake Erie. Such a measure was a departure from the spirit of that arrangement by which the American and British navies were respectively reduced to one vessel on Lake Champlain, one on Lake Ontario, and two on Lake Erie and the upper lakes, not exceeding one hundred tons burden each, and each carrying but one gun. Were the steam frigates to be of one hundred tons burden, and to carry but one cannon? Nobody could believe it. In order that the terms of the arrangement might be correctly understood, he would cite a passage from the message of President Monroe to Congress, in December, 1817, on that subject:

"I have the satisfaction," says the President, "to inform you that an arrangement, which had been commenced by my predecessor, with the British Government, for the reduction of the naval force, by Great Britain and the United States, on the lakes, has been concluded; by which it is provided that neither party shall keep in service on Lake Champlain more than one vessel; on Lake Ontario more than one; and on Lake Erie and the upper lakes more than two; to be armed each with one cannon only; and that all the other armed vessels, of both parties, of which an exact list is interchanged, shall be dismantled. It is also agreed that the force retained shall be restricted in its duty to the internal purposes of each party; and that the arrangement shall remain in force until six months shall have expired after notice given by one of the parties to the other, of its desire that it should terminate."

The object of the arrangement was, to save useless expense on both sides, and to prevent the danger of collision between their armed vessels, on those inland waters.

The measures adopted by the British Government, to which he had thus briefly allueed—the large military forces collected in her provinces—the accumulation of works and materials for war on our Northern frontier—and the naval preparations making on the lakes, imdressively admonished us of the dangers which were impending over us. He could not, representing, as he did, an exposed State, be anxious for war; but a crisis was, he apprehended, approaching, which would demand the most active exertion, the most vigilant preparation. At all events, we ought to be in possession of every necessary information, to enable us to decide what was best to be done on our side. We all know the spirit of aggrandizement which animated the British Government, in all her policy. They were at this moment extending their military conquests in the East; and the journals of the day informed us that they were negotiating for the purchase of he Californias in the West, in the face of the solemn declaration of President Monroe in 1823, that the rights and interests of the United States required it to be made known to the world, "that the American continents were not thenceforth to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power."

The resolution, modified as below, at the suggestion of a distinguished Senator, a friend of the mover, was then agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to the Senate all the information that is possessed by the Government, or can be conveniently obtained, of the military and naval preparations of the English Government on the Northern frontier of the United States, from Lake Superior to the Atlantic Ocean, distinguishing the permanent from the temporary and field works, and particularly noting those which are within the claimed limits of the United States.

SPECIAL ORDER.

The bill to provide for the payment of damages sustained by individuals by the wars with Indian tribes since 1830, being the special order of the day, was taken up as in Committee of the Whole, and after a long discussion, in which Messrs HUBBARD, CLAY of Alabama, LUMPKIN and KING earnestly advocated the passage of the bill, and Messrs. WRIGHT, GRUNDY, and PRENTISS opposed it, its further consideration was postponed until Monday next, and the bill and amendments were ordered to be printed.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 12, 1840.

Mr. CROSS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, represented to the House a memorial and accompanying documents from the Cherokee Indian delegation, which had been previously referred to that committee, for the purpose of having them printed; which was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the unfinished business business of the morning hour to be the following resolution, accompanying the report made by Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, from the Committee of Elections:

Mr. CAMPBELL, chairman of the Committee of Elections, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the papers enumerated in the foregoing list, and the journal of the Committee of Elections in the New Jersey case, comprising its proceedings up to the 5th instant, be printed for the use of the House and the committee.

[This resolution covers all the testimony before the committee at the time the report was made in relation to this subject.]

Mr. R. GARLAND proposed to amend the resolution by adding thereto the following:

"And that said committee be instructed to report the evidence referred to it on the 6th instant, and that the same be printed."

Mr. JENIFER, who was entitled to the floor, spoke in continuation of his remarks of yesterday. In the course of which, he gave way to

Mr. FILLMORE, who made certain explanations; during which much disorder and excitement existed throughout the hall, and several intermediate explanations were made, and interrogatories propounded.

Mr. JENIFER continued, and spoke with great acrimony, and impeached the course of the committee, the nature of which may be judged of by the response of the chairman, who interrupted him for that purpose.

Mr. CAMPBELL observed, that he was indebted to the courtesy of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] for the opportunity of correcting thus early the erroneous impression which the remarks just made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] were calculated to produce, but which he was satisfied the gentleman [Mr. F.] did not intend to leave on the minds of the members of this House. The impression to which he alluded was this: "that all the testimony in the possession of the Committee of Elections, previous to the report on the New Jersey election, had not been examined. So far from this being the case, he here avowed that all the testimony in relation to that case had been taken up, and not only the members of the committee, but the parties themselves, were heard in full upon every part they were disposed to discuss: that the testimony was afterwards taken up in detail by the committee, and its competency decided upon by formal votes.

[Mr. C. here gave way to Mr. BOTTS, who expressed his opinion in relation to the examination of a part of the testimony.]

Mr. C. resumed. Of the testimony thus examined, a large portion was decided to be incompetent. All relating to the illegality of votes had been so decided, except only testimony impeaching about 12 or 13 votes.

Did gentlemen complain that the committee would not consent to expose those who had received a minority of votes, but who claimed to have received the greatest number of legal votes, to the ridicule of parading this testimony in relation to twelve or thirteen votes, to set aside majorities ranging from thirty to near two hundred?

Would it not have been a mere mockery—would it not have been gross injustice, while the parties under the authority of the committee, sanctioned by the House, had gone to New Jersey to take testimony, to have proceeded in their absence to try this election upon its merits, upon testimony so imperfect? Did gentlemen complain, because the committee had not, in violation of it pledge, pursued this course? A course which would have been utterly unwarrantable in reference to the permitted absence of the parties, and inconsistent with the proviso of the resolution of the 28th ultimo.

In speaking of the examination of testimony before the committee, Mr. C. did not allude to the "mysterious sealed package" of which so much had been said. The depositions contained in that package were not in the possession of the committee for examination until after the report had been made, and they had been referred by the House. That this is the correct opinion, is manifest from the circumstance that the House thought it necessary to refer them by a formal vote. That this was the opinion of the gentleman from New York himself, [Mr. FILLMORE.] was evident from the fact that he first voted to refer them, and afterwards moved a reconsideration, to prevent their going to the committee.

Mr. C. would further state, in relation to the examination of testimony, that after the passage of the resolution of the 28th ult. and before the adoption of the report, a gentleman of the committee had called for the reading of testimony in possession of the committee, and that, in compliance with this call, all the papers were read that were called for.

Mr. C. had only risen for the purpose of correcting the impression which he thought the remarks of the gentleman from New York were calculated to produce. He was unwilliag that an impression should exist for a single day, that the committee had not considered all the testimony before it previous to making its report; and therefore it was that he had requested the gentleman from Maryland to allow him the opportunity of this explanation in justification of the committee.

Mr. JENIFER resumed his remarks for a short time, when

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the morning hour having expired, the House agreed to pass to the orders of the day; before doing which, however, by permission,

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications from the President of the United States; which were read, appropriately referred, and ordered to be printed:

WASHINGTON, March 9, 1840.

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress, for their consideration, copies and translations of a correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Spanish Legation, growing out of an application on the part of Spain for a reduction of tonnage duty on her vessels in certain cases.

By a Royal order issued on the 29th of April, 1832, by the King of Spain, in consequence of a representation made to his Government by the Minister of the United States against the discriminating tonnage duty then levied in the ports of Spain upon American vessels, said duty was reduced to one real de vellon, equal to five cents per ton, without reference to the place from whence the vessel came, being the same rate as paid by those of all other nations, including Spain. By the act approved on the 13th July, 1832, a corresponding reduction of tonnage duty upon Spanish vessels in the ports of the United States was authorized, but confined to vessels coming from ports in Spain; in consequence of which said reduction has been applied to such Spanish vessels only as came directly from ports in the Spanish peninsula

The application of the Spanish Government is for the extension of the provisions of the act to vessels coming from other places, and I submit for the consideration of Congress whether the principle of reciprocity would not justify it in regard to all vessels owned in the Peninsula and its dependencies of the Balearic and Canary Islands, and coming from all places other than from the Islands of Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippine; and the repayment of such duties as may have been levied upon Spanish vessels of that class which have entered our ports since the act of 1832 went into operation.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, March, 1840.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before you for your consideration a communication of the Secretary of War accompanied by a report of the Surgeon General of the Army in relation to sites for marine hospitals, selected in conformity for the provisions of the act of March 3, 1837, from which it will be seen that some action on the subject by Congress seems to be necessary.

M. VAN BUREN.

Several bills from the Senate, on the SPEAKER'S table, were taken up, read twice, and committed.

The bill, introduced on leave by Mr. BELL, to secure the freedom of elections, was, by general consent, and on the suggestion of Mr. BELL that the House might not be detained from acting on the Treasury note bill, passed over, on the understanding that it should retain its place on the calendar.

The bill reported on leave by Mr. HAND to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal all acts heretofore passed on this subject, was taken from the SPEAKER'S table; and,

On motion of Mr. HOFFMAN, committed to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWSON of Georgia in the chair,) and took up the bill No. 18, being a bill to provide for the issue of Treasury notes; which having been read,

Mr. JONES of Virginia, said he had to ask the indulgence of the committee, but for a short time, whilst he should undertake, very briefly, to assign the reasons which appeared to him to render the passage of the bill, now under consideration, necessary and proper. And he would here take occasion to remark that this bill had not been introduced from any conviction on his own mind, or upon the mind of the Secretary of the Treasury, so far as he was informed, that the resources of the Government, for the present year, would not be sufficient to meet all its liabilities during the year; in the event, however, that the amount of money to be appropriated by Congress at the present session, should not exceed the estimates submitted at it commencement. If the resources of Government, for the year 1840, should be realized, it was believed that the receipts from customs, from the sales of the public lands, and from the debts due from the Bank of the United States, and from the deposite banks which suspended specie payments in 1837, together with the amount of money which remained in the Treasury undrawn at the commencement of the year, would be sufficient to meet the liabilities of the Government during the year. According to the best information before him, derived from facts furnished by the Treasury Department, (which he was bound to infer must have the most correst information upon all these subjects,) this was the conclusion to which his mind had arrived. But it must be obvious to every gentleman whose mind had been turned to the subject, that coming in, as the receipts of the Government are expected to come in, they may not, and indeed it is now certain that they cannot, be received in time to meet the liabilities of the Government, as they are expected to arise, owing principally to the fact that a much larger portion of these liabilities will fall due in the first half of the year, while a much larger portion of the receipts from which it is expected these demands are to be liquidated, cannot be realized until the last half of the year. In other words, if the receipts and disbursements of the whole year could be spread over the year in something like equal proportion, then from the data before him, he arrived at the conclusion that the means of the Government would be sufficient to meet all its liabilities. It was known to every gentleman here that the debt due from the Bank of the United States, amounting to something more than two and a half millions of dollars (including interest) did not fall due until the first day of October; the Bank having, by the terms of its agreement with the Government, the whole of the month of September to make the payment. It was also known that the debts due from the banks which suspended specie payments in 1837, in the present condition of these banks, some of them now asking for further indulgence, might, by possibility, not be received in time. Indeed it might be that they could not be relied on at all.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina here asked how much was due from these banks.

Mr. J. replied that he would give the gentleman all the information he desired, if he would have a little patience; and he would not keep him out of his reply very long, he might be assured. The amount at present was about $805,000. It was apparent, then, that there was something like three and a half millions of dollars falling due in the last half of the year, which the Government could not control for the purpose of meeting the liabilities which were daily presented for payment; and it would be apparent also that, with that amount now available, the liabilities pressing on the Government could be taken up and discharged. But it must also be known to all who have made themselves acquainted with the subject, that there are very large amounts of Treasury notes, issued under former laws, now falling due—that is, $500,000, I think, on the 5th of March; $250,000 on the 7th, and $1,150,000 in the rest of March, April, and May; making an aggregate of rather less than $2,000,000, to be met on the score of Treasury notes now outstanding.

I again repeat, (said Mr. J.) that this amount of money, if now available, would be sufficient to meet all the liabilities of the Government for the year, without the aid proposed to be afforded by the bill now under consideration.

But, in order that the committee may have a clear view both of the means of the Government for the year, and of its liabilities for the same period, I beg leave here to call the attention of gentlemen to the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances. His statement is this:

"For reasons hereafter to be explained, the receipts into the Treasury, the ensuing year, cannot be estimated so high as in 1839. From the best information possessed by this Department, it is computed that the aggregate of them, available for public purposes, will not exceed 18,000,000, viz. from

Customs - - - -	$15,000,000
Lands - - - -	3,503,000
Miscellaneous - - -	100,000
Add to these the balance available and applicable to other purposes, which it is supposed will be in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1840 - - -	1,556,385
The efficient means in that year will then amount, in the aggregate, to - - - -	20,156,385
If Congress should make appropriations to the extent desired by the different Departments, the expenditures for 1840, independent of the redemption of Treasury notes, are estimated at - -	20,000,000
Including all the Treasury notes to be redeemed, the aggregate expenditure would be about -	22,750,000
This would leave a deficit in the Treasury at the close of the year amounting to - - - -	2,593,645"

But the Secretary goes on to say:

"There will be due from the United States Bank in September next, on its fourth bond, about -	2,526,576
The principal now due on the Treasurer's deposites in other banks, which suspended specie payments in 1837, is - -	1,149,904
Should all these claims be collected in 1840, they would prevent a deficiency, and leave an available balance in the Treasury of nearly	1,082 865"

It will be seen (continued Mr. J.) that, according to the estimates furnished by the Secretary, giving us a full account of the whole means as well as of all the liabilities of the Government, in the event of the Government realizing the debts here referred to, there would be, at the close of the year, and provided the estimate were not exceeded by the appropriations made by Congress, a balance of $1,082,000. Owing, however, to the causes to which I have already had occasion to advert, and to others which are more specifically stated by the Secretary of the Treasury in a recent report made by him, it appears that much the larger portion of the liabilities of the Government, as I have before said, are thrown upon the first half of the year, and that the larger portion of the receips are thrown upon the last half, thus bringing about that state of facts set forth in a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and to which I now beg to call the attention of the committee. It bears date the 17th day of February last.

Mr. J. read statement A, (accompanying said report.)

"Money in the Treasury February 10, 1840, available for general purposes, computed to be about $1,700,000, but at the end of the month it will probably be reduced to - -	$1,300,000
Not over two-thirds of this will be situated on the seaboard, and convenient for use to pay pensions and redeem Treasury notes.
Receipts in March, April, and May, from customs and lands, estimated at - - - -	3,600,000
Receipts from banks in those months, indebted in 1837 as depositories, estimated at - - -	200,000
Now and before the 1st June, computed aggregate means - -	$5,100,000"
"Expenditures for pensions required by the 5th March, as estimated by the War Department a $1,760,000 of which will then be needed, besides what has been recently advanced, about - -	$900,000
Treasury notes falling due by March 7th, not yet redeemed - -	550,000
Treasury notes falling due by March 13th, not yet redeemed - -	250,000
Treasury notes falling due in the rest of March, April, and May, and others then redeemable -	1,150,000
Ordinary expenditures in March, April, and May, out of appropriations already made, and new ones which are expected to pass, and are required to carry into effect existing laws for ordinary objects, before 1st June, estimated at - - - -	4,500,000

	$7,350,000
Least balance usually proper to have on hand at various points, near as well as remote - -	2,000,000
Add for the 1st June, to meet what is immediately due under the many new appropriations passed near the the close of the session	500,000
	$9,850,000
Deduct the computed means -	5,100,000
Amount of additional means appearing expedient now and before the 1st June - -	$4,750,000"

From these statements (continued Mr. J.) it must, I think, be obvious to every man that, whilst the resources of the Government may, and probably will, be ample to meet its liabilities during the year; yet, thrown, as a very large portion of these liabilities are, upon the first half year, while the means to meet them will not be available until the last half—I say it must be obvious that, without some legislation to regulate these fluctuations in the receipts and disbursements, the Government with the most ample means for the whole year's operations, may be placed in a situation in which it might be unable to meet promptly its numerous pecuniary obligations, and to maintain unbroken its faith. It will also be seen that it is not intended, by the measure now under consideration, to add one dollar to the amount of expenditures, but so to use the credit of the Government as to provide for and obviate any serious pecuniary embarrassment. To enable the Government at all times to meet promptly and faithfully its obligations, is an object which I am bound to presume every man, of all parties, has sincerely at heart. I am sure there is no Representative of the people on this floor, to whatever party he may belong, who would not feel deeply mortified, as an American citizen, to see the Government of his own choice placed even for a day in a situation where it could not meet promptly its pecuniary liabilities. And if differences of opinion exist among us upon this subject, I am persuaded it is not as to the propriety of affording relief, but as to the best mode in which the object can be attained. I do not entertain a doubt but that we all look to the same object; we all desire to save the Government from such a dilemma; and if we differ at all, as we shall, I repeat that it will not be as to the propriety of affording relief, but as to the mode in which it shall be furnished.

Looking to the report to which I have had occasion already to call the attention of the members of the committee, and in which the resources of the Government, and its liabilities for the year, are clearly stated, it would seem, I should suppose, that the measure now under consideration could not be a matter of surprise to any gentleman who has investigated the subject. A careful examination of that report will satisfy every man, not only of the necessity of granting the relief here asked, but that it is a subject to which the Secretary of the Treasury himself has continued to look with the most anxious concern; and that he has again and again invited, in the most pressing manner, the action of Congress upon it. In illustration of this view, and in justice to a faithful public officer, I beg very briefly to call the attention of gentlemen to several paragraphs in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, to which I have referred. I do this, not only as an act of justice to him, but for the additional reason that we may see clearly the grounds on which this application has been made. I do it, too, because I have heard it said, here and elsewhere, that this measure has been postponed to the latest possible period; and that then, like all such measures, when it was brought up, all would be hurry and confusion, and that there would not be time to consider any thing. By reference to the report, it will be seen that the Secretary of the Treasury stands relieved, at all events, from this charge. In the very next line after the estimates I have read, he says:

"It is not, however, considered prudent to rely exclusively on the collection of these debts."

He then goes on to say:

"One mode, then, of obviating any difficulty from that circumstance will be to reduce the aggregate of new appropriations, by postponing some and lessening others, so that the means probably available will be sufficient to meet all calls upon the Treasury, and leave in it an average balance of about two millions.

"It is believed, for reasons enumerated hereafter, that such a reduction is possible without essential injury to any useful object, and that this balance is the smallest which is adequate to secure promptitude and good faith in public payments so heavy in amount as ours, so unexpected at times in the demands for them, and so dispersed over a wide territory. If the appropriations are not thus reduced, it will be wise to provide seasonably in some other way for the amounts of the contingent deficiency, and of such a balance."

He would beg leave also to call the attention of the committee to page 11, of the same report, in which the Secretary says:

"Much has at times been wisely done by Congress to supply means for meeting unexpected deficiencies. But all legal provisions heretofore adopted for that purpose having expired, our financial operations will be constantly exposed to danger, unless some permanent safeguard under contingencies is established.

"These circumstances must constitute an apology for once more explaining some of the grounds in favor of such a measure, and earnestly asking speedy legislation concerning it."

He then informs us:

"The principal sources of our present revenue are sensibly affected by fluctuations not only in commercial prosperity, but in the crops, the banking policy, and credit systems of even foreign nations. The influence of these causes seems to become yearly more changeable and more uncertain in its extent."

The Secretary goes on to say:

"All these, and similar considerations in favor of some permanent provision on this subject, apply with still greater force than they have heretofore. The available balance in the Treasury to facilitate its operations is much smaller than has formerly been usual. The receipts on the debts still due from banks, after two previous disappointments as to some of them, must be regarded with increased doubt; and, if they should be paid within the coming year, the outstanding Treasury notes become redeemable in the first half of it, and must be discharged some months before the bond of the United States Bank falls due in September."

The Secretary then says:

"Why, then, should not a constant safeguard, or some permanent remedy under such irregularities, be provided? The omission to do this, can hardly be considered the true check on extravagant expenditure, as that check would seem to consist rather in a forbearance to make unnecessary appropriations than in a refusal to provide ample means for paying with promptitude, under all probable contingencies, what has already been appropriated and has thus received the deliberate sanction of Congress. The national pride, no less than its honor and credit, appears to be concerned in adopting some measure on this subject, stable, efficient, creditable to free institutions, and possessing a paramount influence to preserve unspotted the public faith.

"The States now possess, separately, quite as deep an interest in such an arrangement as the General Government, since a blow on the credit of the latter would, like an electric shock, be felt through the whole of them, and inevitably depreciate still more their immense amounts of stocks.

"It is hoped that an actual failure to furnish means to make prompt payment, under all contingencies, and thus producing the very violation of good faith so much to be deprecated, will not be necessary to awaken its guardians to the urgent importance of some such remedial provision; a measure, without which, in the shape of an investment, or large balance on hand, or authority given to postpone certain classes of appropriation, when the revenue proves insufficient for the whole, or some power to borrow money, or issue, on interest, when necessary, drafts or exchequer bills, no financial system, in any enlightened country, has been, or can be, long administered with safety and honor.

"In our system, the provision on this subject was very uniform and permanent, till the extinguishment of the national debt in 1835. Previous to that time, a large balance beyond the expenses for ordinary purposes was generally collected, and, being kept on hand till near the close of the year, so as to assist in any contingency, was then, if not thus wanted, applied towards the payment of the debt.

"After that time, the first resort, in the event of fluctuations, was temporary, and consisted of the accidental and unexpected accumulation which immediately followed. When parts of that accumulation were expended, and the residue was divided among the States, instead of being invested, and held to meet deficiencies, the recall of it as fast as needed for the latter purpose, was still sanctioned by Congress, and constituted the next permanent remedy. But this power of recall was afterwards taken from the Treasury Department; and, instead of it, the payment of one instalment was postponed, and a very limited authority given to issue Treasury notes for aid in any contingency. That authority also expired in June last, and, while in force, contained requisitions immediately to receive those notes in payments when offered, and, at the same time, preventing the reissue of them, which proved to be exceedingly inconvenient and hazardous, which have already rendered two additional acts of Congress necessary, and which, in a moneyed crisis like the present, not only endanger all fiscal operations, but would have stopped some of the most important of them, if not obviated in a degree by seasonable arrangements, made in anticipation of difficulty."

In further illustration of this view of the subject, he would read but one sentence more from the report of the Secretary.

"The Department, therefore, is now without any resort, temporary or permanent, in case of material deficiencies; and considering all the circumstances before mentioned, with the dangerous liability in law to have the whole outstanding Treasury notes paid in at any moment for public dues, without a power remaining to issue others in their stead; considering, also, the present revulsions in the commercial world, which affect so seriously the receipts from both duties and lands; considering the disasters which are befalling the banks and rendering our collected funds in some cases wholly unavailable, and the advances necessary to be soon made for the large payments of pensions, and Treasury notes falling due in March, the earliest attention to new legislation on this subject seems highly prudent, if not indispensable, for the effectual security of the public credit."

I have felt it my duty (continued Mr. J.) to advert to these passages, to show that our consideration was invited to this subject at the earliest possible moment, and to show that those gentlemen who seem to suppose that it was postponed to the last moment, in order that it might be passed over with the greatest possible haste, were mistaken; that their opinions were formed without investigating carefully, as I should conceive, documents accessible to every member of the committee. Now, I would ask if there is an individual here who does not see that this is a subject in which the Secretary has felt a most anxious and deep concern—or who is not prepared to admit that the necessity of this measure was foreseen by him, and that early legislation was invited? There can be but one opinion on this point. The necessity was foreseen by all, and it must therefore cease to be matter of surprise that this bill has been introduced.

Nor has the Secretary of the Treasury failed to point out the mode proper, in his judgment, for furnishing relief. In the communication to which I have adverted, and which I will not take up the time of the committee by reading, it will be seen what his views were. He looked, in the first place, to a general reduction of the aggregate of new appropriations; he next points to the twenty-eight millions now on deposite with the States; and, thirdly, he says there are two remaining modes—one to borrow money, and the other to issue (on interest, if necessary,) Treasury drafts or notes.

The Committee of Ways and Means, after the most mature deliberation which they were enabled to bestow, have reported, as the result of their deliberations, the bill now under consideration. I know much difference of opinion exists on the subject; I know it has been so on all previous occasions when similar measures have been introduced. The friends of the measure, regarding the deficiency in the Treasury as merely temporary, propose to anticipate for a short time the revenue of the Government, which cannot be received in time to meet its liabilities as they may arise. Those gentlemen who stand opposed to us, regarding the deficiency not as temporary, but permanent, will, in all probability, propose on this occasion what had been before proposed in similar cases, to make permanent provision for it by contracting a loan, and thus, in all likelihood, incurring a permanent national debt. I have not been educated in that school of politicians who regard a national debt as a national blessing. No, sir. I regard a national debt as a national curse, never to be saddled upon the country, except under circumstances of the most overruling necessity. Then, and not till then, shall I ever consent to incur a permanent national debt. Whether the deficiency be temporary or permanent, must be judged of by the best information within our reach, and the best lights that are afforded to us. I have looked, in the formation of my own opinion, to the Secretary of the Treasury, whose position enables him to possess more correct information than almost any other man. The whole subject is before him. Every avenue of information is accessible to him. I have already shown the opinion he entertained three months ago, which opinion he entertains now. He informed us on the 15th of February, in the communication to which I have referred, that his opinions remained unchanged, except so far as the revenue may be affected by the decisions of the courts of justice upon the tariff laws; and so far as they may possibly be affected by the universal embarrassment which seems to have spread over the whole country.

We have, then, his opinion at the commencement of the session; and, with a full knowledge of passing events from that day to this, when he last alludes to the subject, he tells us his opinions are unchanged. But suppose he is wrong. Suppose he has over-estimated the revenue for 1840. I fear we have a long session before us; and thus, if the Secretary shall prove to be mistaken, abundant opportunities will be afforded (after we have seen what may be the action of the House on various other matters of public interest, and what may be the probable amount to be received from customs) to make the provision that may seem most desirable. In the mean time, I am bound to come to the conclusion that the deficiency is temporary and not permanent. And in this view of the question, we are called upon to determine whether it would be best to issue Treasury notes or to go into market for a loan, and incur a public debt: the one mode will afford prompt and speedy relief, the other may not—one is certain, the other not—the one is within our own grasp, the other sends us out upon a hunt.

But suppose a loan shall be resorted to; if I am right in the views I have expressed, and the Secretary of the Treasury right in his, it follows as clerly as the light of day, that the means of the Government will be sufficient to discharge the amount borrowed in a single year: why, then, borrow for a term of years? for that you must do; you cannot get your loan taken up unless it is to continue for two or three years. Why should we incur a national debt which must hang on our necks for years, when we want the money only for nine months? Gentlemen do not so act in their private concerns; when they want the use of a sum of money for nine months, they do not borrow it for four or five years. The lessons derived from the every-day business of individual life furnish, generally, the best rules and principles for conducting affairs of a public nature. And how are you to get the amount? Does any gentleman believe that the capitalists will withdraw their funds out of the stocks, and from under mortgage security, to take up a Government loan for one year? It were idle to expect it. But if it could be done, the report of the Secretary tells you that the Government will need immediate relief within a few weeks from the date of that report; which few weeks have nearly expired; and then the disposable funds of the Treasury will be below what they have been for a great while. Where do gentlemen expect to get this loan? In New York? In Boston? In Philadelphia? In any other of our great commercial cities, where every nerve is strained to sustain the banks which pay specie, and, I presume, to enable those banks which do not, shortly to resume; where the community is pressed down by a heavy foreign debt, and the banks have turned and turned the screw as long as the people can bear it? It seems to me it will scarcely be possible. And if you fail in our own country, then you must despatch a messenger to England, Holland, or some other of the European countries. Do gentlemen reflect how long this will take? You have, remember, no great steamship to command; it will require at least two months to negotiate the loan and to return. And what is to become of the Government in the mean while? It will be unable to pay the army, or the navy, or the brave men who are now fighting your battles; nor will it be able to pay a dollar towards the ordinary current expenses of the Departments. And, when we shall have done this, and thus succeeded in humbling and disgracing the Government of our own choice, what shall we have accomplished? What shall we have gained? The comfort of knowing that we have established a permanent national debt.

But we want five millions of dollars; and we want it in specie or in convertible paper. Where are we to get it? From the banks? Why, they cannot redeem their own notes. But, allowing we may get it from the banks, what shall we next hear? "Is a Government that has been for years waging war against the banks, (for that is the charge,) which is utterly hostile to all banking institutions, to be indulged by these very institutions with a loan of five millions of dollars?" Why, sir, it is alleged that, if you collect five millions of your revenue in a whole year from banks, in gold and silver, to enable the Government to hold its own funds safely for disbursement, you are "warring against the banks." With how much more plausibility will they speak, should the Government draw from the banks five millions of their specie? I should expect to hear the charge rung on every change from one extremity of the Union to the other.

But adopt this bill, and it relieves the banks—it furnishes the very thing which is needed as a substitute for specie. These notes will soon find their way to our Atlantic cities, and get into the custom-houses; they will find their way, too, to the Far West, and go into the land offices in payment for the public lands; and, so far from operating as an injury to the banks, the effect will be to sustain and relieve them.

Again: Adopt this measure, and the Government retains the subject its own power. If you resort to a loan, the Government has then to go to the capitalists of the land; if not, to the shavers of the land; and every body knows how the Government fares in such a case. The money holder lays down his conditions, and the Government must come up to them or go without its loan. But, if you issue Government bonds, in the shape of Treasury notes of $100 each, you, Mr Chairman, will have no objection to take them in part of your per diem pay, nor should I; and it will be just so with all the people; they will gladly receive them, without imposing upon you conditions. But in the other case, you are left at the mere mercy of money dealers.

In every view of the case, I have a decided preference for Treasury notes over a loan, both upon the score of economy and convenience. Pass this bill, and the relief will be immediate and effectual; reject it, and the consequences will be such as all will deplore.

In the remarks which I have had the honor to submit, I have endeavored to present the subject in a financial point of view alone, apart from those exciting political topics, the bare mention of which seldom fails to produce agitating and protracted discussions in this House. I have deemed it proper to pursue this course for the reason that the discussion of subjects not directly connected with the pending proposition, are not likely to aid us in our deliberations; and for the additional reason that I do not desire, by any act of mine, unnecessarily to delay the decision of a question upon which the interests, the honor, and the integrity of the Government require prompt and speedy action.

Mr. CUSHING obtained the floor, and replied at great length to the remarks of the chairman [Mr. JONES] He was not disposed to withhold from the Government the means proper and necessary to carry on its operations, but he would hold the Administration responsible for the disbursement of such means as were placed at its disposal for that purpose; yet whilst he did not wish to throw any impediments in the way of the successful operations of Government, though it was in the hands of the present party, he expressed a wish that after the 4th of March next the Government would be in the possession of different administrators, and congratulated himself that he saw in the future that a brighter Aurora was about to dawn upon this country. He said it had been intimated in the public papers that the Opposition wished to avoid action on the bill before the House. He denied that such was the fact. It was true that he had, as did the party with which he acted, voted against the suspension of the rules for the purpose of considering the bill out of its order; because they believed action upon it would have been facilitated by pursuing the regular course of business, and by taking it up in proper order for consideration. He examined the annual message of the President of the United States, and report of the Secretary of the Treasury, touching the condition of the finances, and commented at length thereon, for the purpose of showing that the contingencies had not arrived, which it was alleged in those documents might arrive, to render it necessary to resort to loans to meet the demands upon the Treasury. There was nothing in those documents which contemplated the issue of Treasury notes, as a mode to raise funds to replenish the Treasury, in case the anticipated resources of the year should not be realized, or be adequate to the wants of the Government. He inferred that an issue of Treasury notes was not then contemplated.

The President, in his message, had said that if Congress did not exceed the estimate, there would be no necessity for increased taxes or a resort to loans. For one, he desired that the appropriations should be kept within the estimates, and that no pretext, on that ground, should be afforded for causing a loan. So far as this session has transpired, the appropriation did not exceed the estimates; from that he argued that the cause for the issue existed elsewhere. Mr. C. then went into a constitutional argument to show the impropriety of the issue of Treasury notes. He inferred, from the fact that a proposition to give the power to the Government to issue bills of credit was voted down in the convention for the formation of the Constitution, as will be seen by the debate recently published, that the issue of those notes was unconstitutional. He did not deny that, in a certain contingency, the Government might issue; that it might do so, not in the form of credit paper, but in the form of a draft upon specie, or other means in its possession at the time they are emitted. He then adverted to that part of the argument of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means against resorting to a permanent loan, and endeavored to show that the uttering of these notes was as much a loan or a national debt as if the Government were to borrow the money at a specified rate of interest. He cited the opinions of Jefferson, Hamilton, Crawford, and Benton, against a resort to Treasury notes for the purpose of raising money; they considered it very dangerous, and justifiable only in cases of extreme emergency, and when other modes failed. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. JONES,] in speaking of the two modes, said if they resorted to a loan, the Government would have to go to the shavers of the land, and that every body knew how the Government would fare in such a case. The issue of Treasury notes, he contended, would be placing the creditors of the Government as much at the mercy of the capitalists and shavers. It, in fact, relieved the Government from the responsibility of being shaved, and shifted it upon the helpless creditors, who were the least able to bear it. If the Government resorted to a direct loan, it would bring that much specie into the country, and tend towards its relief; but if it resorted to the issue of notes, bearing six per cent. interest, it would suck up the capital which is now used to relieve the mercantile community.

It would further oppress the community, which was now experiencing such extreme suffering. The banks, instead of loaning to the merchants, and discounting the business paper of the community, would invest their means in these notes. He insisted that it was very inconsistent in an Administration which argued against a paper representative of value, and, in the very face of it, to ask for five millions of paper circulation. He believed the only proper and honest remedy to meet the defect was to raise money by a direct loan. Mr. C. in the course of his remarks, adverted to the compromise act, contending that Massachusetts was not a party to it, and that when the proper time arrived, he would be for disturbing it, by levying an increased duty on certain articles to replenish the national Treasury, which was being exhausted by its operation, and particularly luxuries, such as wines and silks from beyond the Cape of Good Hope.

Mr. C. dwelt at length on the increase in the expenditures of the Government during the past and present Administrations; which, he said, was far beyond the increased resources and population of the country. The civil list alone had doubled, while the population in the same given period had increased but one-fourth, or from twelve to fifteen millions He examined into the causes which had produced it; and also into the history of the passage of the appropriations, to show where the responsibility rested for the excess of those appropriations beyond the estimates of the Departments, and contended that the Opposition were not responsible to the extent which had been charged upon it. He was willing to take his share of the responsibility for so much of the excess as had been caused by the party with which he acted. They were such as could be defended. Mr. C. before concluding, gave way to

Mr. MARVIN, on whose motion the committee rose, and reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. M.

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, March 13, 1840.

Mr. NORVELL presented the petition of a number of citizens of Michigan, praying a reduction of the rates of postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. N. also presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Wisconsin, praying the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, the repair of the road from Fort Howard to Fort Crawford, and the establishment of a port of entry at Green Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and Commerce.

Mr. N. also presented the memorial of John Martin; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of a number of citizens of Seneca county, New York, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of a number of citizens of Hancock county, Maine, praying a reduction of the rates of postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. TALLMADGE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing members of Congress to receive free of postage, the legislative documents of the several States.

After some remarks from Messrs. TALLMADGE and GRUNDY, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred

The petition of Etienne Lefebre, and

The petition of Henry H. Browne, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the Joint Committee on the Library, to which was referred the joint resolution from the House for the disposition of certain documents now in the Library of Congress, reported the same without amendment; and, on Mr. T's motion, it was considered and passed.

The bill for the discontinuance of the office of Surveyor General in the several districts so soon as the surveys therein can be completed; for abolishing land offices under certain circumstances; and to abolish the office of Solicitor of the General Land Office, was taken up.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama explained the provisions of the bill at length, and advocated the passage of the first two sections, but was opposed to the third, for which he offered a substitute, proposing to abolish the office of Recorder, and retain that of Solicitor.

After some remarks from Messrs. KING, SMITH of Indiana, and GRUNDY, on motion of Mr. G. the motion of Mr. CLAY was divided so as to take the question on striking out the third section of the bill; which was agreed to; and the further consideration of the bill was postponed until Monday next.

BANKS OF THE DISTRICT.

The bill to regulate the issuing and circulating of bank paper in the District of Columbia, being taken up,

Mr. MERRICK hoped it would not be pressed at this time, but that an opportunity might be afforded to the Committee on the District of Columbia to examine the question, so as to enable them to present their views to the Senate. He thought that in the course of a week they would be prepared to do so, and trusted the delay would be acceded to by the Senator who introduced the bill.

Mr. TAPPAN said he had no intention of hurrying the passage of the bill before its provisions were thoroughly examined, when he had little doubt the chairman of the Committee on the Dictrict [Mr. MERRICK] would be prepared to assist in passing it.

The bill was then informally passed over.

LAWS OF NATIONS.

The following resolutions submitted by Mr. CALHOUN on the 4th instant, were taken up:

Resolved, That a ship or vessel on the high seas, in time of peace, engaged in a lawful voyage, is, according to the laws of nations, under the exclusive jurisdiction of the State to which her flag belongs, as much so as if constituting a part of its own domain.

Resolved, That if such ship or vessel should be forced, by stress of weather or other unavoidable cause, into the port of a friendly power, she world, under the same laws, lose none of the rights appertaining to her on the high seas, but, on the contrary, she and her cargo, and persons on board, with their property, and all the rights belonging to their personal relations, as established by the laws of the State to which they belong, would be under the protection which the laws of nations extended to the unfortunate under such circumstances.

Resolved, That the brig Enterprize, which was forced unavoidably by stress of weather into Port Hamilton, Bermuda island, while on a lawful voyage on the high seas from one part of the Union to another, comes within the principles embraced in the foregoing resolutions; and that the seizure and detention of the negroes on board by the local authorities of the island was an act in violation of the laws of nations, and highly unjust to our citizens to whom they belong.

Mr. CALHOUN submitted his views at length on the resolutions, [which will be published at an early day,] and after some remarks from Messrs. GRUNDY and KING,

On motion by Mr. KING, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business; after which

It adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, March 13th, 1840.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, the vote referring the joint resolution in relation to the survey of the lake coasts to the Committee on Roads and Canals was reconsidered, and the resolution was committed to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. EVERETT, the claim of Joseph Parker, which had been reported unfavorably upon by the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, was recommitted to that committee.

The SPEAKER announced that the question before the House was the resolution reported from the Committee of Eections by Mr. CAMPBELL, chairman, proposing to print all the documents and testimony in relation to the New Jersey disputed election, and the amendment thereto submitted by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GARLAND.]

Mr. FILLMORE (by permission of Mr. JENIFER) rose and said, in substance, that since he spoke yesterday, he had discovered a mistake in copying one of the resolutions of the committee to which he referred. He understood the mistake in copying, occurred in consequence of the resolution having been adopted in parts, and a portion of the first part was stricken out before the latter was added, and this was overlooked by the person who copied it. The resolution should read as follows:

Resolved, That we will now take up the testimony which has been referred to this committee in the New Jersey case; and if, during the investigation of the subject, it shall be desired by either party to furnish additional testimony, that then the parties be allowed such reasonable time as may be determined by the committee, to take such additional testimony, in the manner prescribed by the laws of New Jersey relating to contested elections, unless the parties agree upon some other mode which may be sanctioned by the committee."

As he was desirous of doing equal and exact justice to all, he deemed it due to the House, to the committee, and to himself, to make this correction; and he hoped that the Reporters who might notice his remarks, would make the correction.

Mr. JENIFER of Maryland, who was entitled to the floor from yesterday morning, again addressed the House in support of the amendment until the expiration of the morning hour, without concluding his speech. He attacked the course of the committee with much severity, and called up Mr. RIVES and Mr. CAMPBELL, the chairman, who corrected many of his statements distorting the facts involved in the action of the committee.

Mr. J. was on the floor, when, the morning having expired,

Mr. JONES, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means called for the orders of the day, and asked that the House would resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the Treasury note bill. He knew that many gentlemen were anxious to continue the consideration of the subject now before the House, but he felt that a sense of duty demanded of him an effort to press through the important measure he wished to take up. The wants of the Government called for speedy action upon it.

Mr. MEDILL thought the course gentlemen had pursued in the discussion on the New Jersey case, by their attacks on the committee, and by occupying several morning hours, without affording an opportunity to reply, was very unjust, and hoped the subject would be disposed of before proceeding to any other business. He trusted the House would, by universal consent, agree to finish this subject.

Mr. RIVES of Virginia also expressed a wish that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] might, by universal consent, be permitted to finish his remarks.

Mr. JONES said the Treasury note bill was a subject of too much importance to pass by, and could not consent; and as objection had been made, he moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to submit a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take it up; and the question being taken, the motion was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER asked leave, and before going to the orders of the day, laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 2d of March, 1839, enclosing communications from the several Executive Departments, transmitting a list of officers who derive their appointment from the President and Senate, who have been dismissed from office since the 3d of March, 1789; which was read, and,

On motion of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, laid before the House a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the balances on the books of the Register of the Treasury, which have remained due and unsettled more than three years prior to the 30th September, 1839; which was read, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

On motion of Mr. BIDDLE, the House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, [Mr. DAVEE in the Chair,] and took up the bills on the private calendar; to many of which, there being no objection, they were laid aside to be reported to the House.

The bill for the relief of the assignee of Low, Taylor and Co. was taken up in its order, and after some remarks from Messrs. ATHERTON, HABERSHAM, L. WILLIAMS, CUSHING, and RUSSELL, was laid aside to retain its place on the calendar until the gentleman who reported it [Mr. LAWRENCE] should be present to explain its principles.

The bill for the relief of the representatives of John Wilkinson was next taken up, and after a few remarks from Messrs. COOPER of Georgia, RUSSELL, PETRIKIN, and GOODE, as to the principle involved in the bill, (it being a bill to indemnify an individual for the loss of a certain house in which munition of war had been stored by the Government, and was destroyed by the English during the war,) it was laid aside to be reported to the House.

The bill for the relief of Bailey and De Lord was taken up in its order; when

Mr. HAND sent to the Chair an amendment, proposing to give the sum of —— dollars, and interest in full of the claim. This amendment being read, Mr. H. advocated it at length. He said that it fully appeared by the papers, that in 1814 and 1815 the army at Plattsburgh were without pay, owing to the extreme embarrassments of the General Government, which were so great, that it could not, in that vicinity, get trusted for a stack of hay without security. That the army was without necessaries. That pay was promised from month to month until the troops were in a state of mutiny from repeated disappointments. In this crisis, the officers applied to Bailey and Delord, wealthy merchants of Plattsburgh, for relief. Bailey and Delord furnished supplies to the officers and soldiers upon that application, in the way shown by the report, to nearly $30,000. These supplies were furnished upon the request of the officers, and their assurance that when the troops were paid, they should be paid said advances. That after making large advances, Bailey and Delord became alarmed, and hesitated, upon which General Macomb urged them by no means to stop, and repeated the most positive assurance that they should be paid in full when the troops were paid off; upon which solicitation and assurance they continued supplies. That a large port on of the army was ordered away from Plattsburgh before receiving any pay, by which Bailey and Delord received very little. That afterwards they sent to the various stations to which the troops were scattered, to obtain payment when the troops paid off, but from obvious causes but little was received, and that hardly paid the attendant expenses. That the proof went to show a total loss of $18,000 or $20,000; and Bailey and Delord were made bankrupt thereby.

He (Mr. H.) respectfully dissented from the principle advanced by the Committee of Claims, that this case was analagous to that of sutler. Sutlers were governed by known regulations and guided themselves accordingly. Here, as the papers fully showed, the advances were made upon the earnest solicitations and most solemn assurances of the officers, fully warranted by the exigencies of the case, that they should be paid. Without these, no advances would have been made. He dwelt, as to this point, upon the facts appearing by the papers, parts of which he read. He contended that such was the distress and insubordination in the army that the officers were warranted in making these assurances, and it was a case of sheer justice and no gratuity. The assurances of the officers, to say nothing of the effect of the quasi acceptance of the orders by the paymasters, were binding upon the Government, and analagous to the cases of necessaries furnished to a ship in a foreign port in distress, or to a child eloigned. The bill proposed to pay what could be substantiated by vouchers, and where the Government had not paid the soldiers. This, he insisted, was entirely nugatory, a mockery of justice, for the papers showed the vouchers had been destroyed by the conflagration of petitioner's house, and, besides, probably nothing was left due from the Government to the soldier.

The claim (said Mr. H.) originated in a deed of patriotism, which, perhaps, prevented those who achieved the victory at Plattsburg from the disgrace of mutiny, but which, by its pecuniary effects, had sent one of the claimants to the grave a beggar, and left the other to wear away the remnant of a long life in poverty.

Mr. DAWSON (one of the Committee of Claims) opposed the amendments. He thought it dangerous to allow officers in the army to bind Government by such contracts. It was a power not to be thus confided in that loose manner. The committee thought the principle adopted by them the true one,

Mr. PETRIKIN thought the time that had elapsed, a very suspicious circumstance.

Mr. HAND replied briefly. As to the agency, he trusted that if Government had had the benefit, and equity was on the side of the claim, no technical objection of want of power to bind the principal would be interposed. As to amount, the proof was very clear, even in a court of law, loss of vouchers would admit secondary evidence. With regard to time, the papers showed much embarrassment and confusion of affairs, subsequently encountered by petitioners. But again, if the claim was fully made out, he could not consent to argue the question of the statute of limitations in such a case before an American Congress.

The question was then taken, but the amendment lost.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Fillebrown, came up in its order, when

Mr. LEADBETTER moved to strike out the enacting clause, and spoke in opposition to the bill; and was followed by Messrs. DAWSON and PETRIKIN, also in opposition to it, on the ground that the claim was not founded in justice; that the individual was receiving a salary of $1200 per year as clerk under the Government at the time he disbursed the money on which the claim is based. They thought the Government entitled to the whole services of the clerk, without extra compensation.

Messrs. EVANS, RUSSELL, POPE, and MONROE followed in support of the claim, contending that, inasmuch as the clerk received his salary for working certain hours, fixed by regulation and for doing a specific duty, that he should be paid for extra duties required of him under a different branch of service. They contended that it was a just one, and had been admitted by a jury of the country, and that it would be bad policy to refuse to grant a claim under such circumstances.

Mr. LEADBETTER, at the request of Mr. RUSSELL, withdrew his motion to strike out the enacting clause; and the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

The committee here finding itself without a quorum, on motion of Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky, rose and reported that fact to the House; when

Mr. ANDREWS moved that when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next; and on the demand of

Mr. R. GARLAND, the yeas and nays having been ordered on the said motion, Mr. ANDREWS withdrew it.

On motion, the House then adjourned till to-morrow.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, March 14, 1840.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections by Mr. CAMPBELL, to print all the testimony in relation to the New Jersey contest, and the amendment thereto offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GARLAND,] to print testimony received since the report was made.

Mr. JENIFER, being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks. He said he would endeavor to expose the rank injustice done the minority of the committee, and that he was doubly fortified in the grounds which he had taken in relation to the two reports. Mr. J. then read the resolution instructing the committee as to the manner in which they were directed to make their report, for the purpose of proving their inconsistency in regard to its provisions. He said it appeared, when gentlemen came to the test in regard to the printing of the report, some of the members of the committee were in favor of printing all the testimony which would elucidate the report; but the majority of the committee, and the gentleman from Virginia, were unwilling to come before the House, that the House might judge how far the journal of the committee should be printed.

Mr. J. adverted to the report of the minority of the committee, and said the previous question was taken before gentleman had an opportunity of ascertaining whether it was correct or not—a procedure unprecedented in the annals of legislation; and if a similar course of proceeding should take place in the British Parliament, it would bring down dismay and denunciation. A spirit is abroad in the land, (said Mr. J.) and will be felt in the Old Dominion on the second Monday in April; and that the gentleman's [Mr. RIVES's] friends might succeed there, it was important that the report of the minority should be suppressed. Mr. J. spoke at some length in relation to the subject before the House; and

The SPEAKER having announced that the morning hour had expired,

Mr. RUSSELL called for the orders of the day.

Mr. RIVES hoped the House would, by universal consent, permit the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] to finish his remarks, to enable the House to order the printing of this testimony immediately.

Mr. RUSSELL objected, and called for the orders of the day.

Mr. RIVES moved to suspend the rules for the purpose, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were, yeas 89, nays 75.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. RIVES said he rose for the purpose of asking the favor of the House that he might make a statement, in relation to what had occurred this morning in particular. He believed the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JENIFER] in the course of his remarks, did him injustice; and he had not been afforded an opportunity to ascertain whether it was intentionally done or not. It was with that view that he had moved a suspension of the rules, in order that he might, at the earliest opportunity that he could, call on that gentleman for an explanation. He wished, as a personal favor, that he now might make a statement to the House.

Mr. ALFORD said, as the House has refused to suspend the rules, I object. I object to all personal matters which may be attempted to be introduced into this House.

Mr. RIVES replied. Let me tell the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. ALFORD,] that his refusing to suffer me to proceed, at this time, may produce the very state of things that he, I am inclined to believe, wished to avoid.

Mr. ALFORD persisted in his objection.

Mr. R. said, then I appeal respectfully to my political friends of this House never to proceed to other business until I have time to do myself justice.

[Much confusion here prevailed in the hall.]

Mr. JENIFER appealed to his political friends to permit the gentleman from Virginia to make his statement.

Mr. STANLY called him to order.

Mr. RIVES said: Mr. Speaker, have I no friend in this House that will move a suspension of the rules, in order that I may be heard?

Mr. BEATTY replied. I move a suspension of the rules for that purpose; and on which

Mr. WELLER demanded the yeas and nays, (to see who it was that was unwilling to enable the gentleman from Virginia to have justice done him.) which were ordered.

Several gentlemen appealed to Mr. ALFORD to withdraw his objection.

Mr. WISE said: If the gentleman from Georgia withdraws his objection, I shall renew it.

Mr. ALFORD raised a question of order whether it was competent to move a suspension of the rules twice for the same purpose, no action having taken place by the House, intervening the motions.

The SPEAKER said the other motion was to suspend the rules for the purpose of considering the subject of the New Jersey question generally, and the motion now was to permit the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] to make a statement in relation to a particular matter, and it was therefore in order.

The question was then taken and the rules were suspended—yeas 132, nays 37.

Mr. RIVES. Mr. Speaker, before I proceed to the consideration of any thing that has been said by the gentleman from Maryland, I beg leave to give my thanks to the House for the privilege it has afforded me. And, further, I have a request to make of the Reporters who are present. I have also the same request to make of the letter-writers. Sir, we have witnesses in this House, and what a gentleman may say is written down by them, and if privately done, it is impossible for them to keep themselves erect before their constituents. Hence I have made this appeal to the reporters and letter-writers. I know that there are partisan reporters, who occasionally give a party coloring in their reports in favor of the side they advocate; but when any thing personal occurs, it is their duty as honorable men to give a fair and impartial statement of it. In this instance, I confidently believe that they will do me justice.

I was apprehensive when the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] first took the floor, knowing that he was a gentleman of much impetuosity of temper, and fearing that he might, under his then state of feeling, do me injustice—so soon as he opened the subject which was calculated to make a breach between us, I told him in the most respectful manner what was the position I occupied, and what my object was. Personal difficulties I always like to avoid, and, to prevent them, it was frequent for gentlemen to throw themselves between another's speaking and what he was likely to say. Without entertaining any idea of what the gentleman might say, and, in order to justify myself to the world, should any thing unpleasant occur, I was disposed to prevent the injury from being done, and therefore interrupted him in the course of his remarks by a brief explanation. On yesterday, I was inclined to think that the gentleman did not put the subject in a situation rendering it necessary for me to notice any thing he said; but I have since understood that he has made a remark, which, if I am not mistaken, may render it necessary for me to bring it to the notice of this House. This I shall do in the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. Speaker: through life it has ever been my disposition to produce harmony among those with whom I may have occasion to act, either in private or in public life. It has been my disposition to throw, whenever I could, oil on the tempestuous waves. It has always been my wish, instead of producing dissensions, to heal them. Instead of endeavoring to produce angry collisions—instead of trying to get one man arrayed against another,—it has always been my disposition to interpose and effect a reconciliation. But, sir, whilst I have done this—whilst I have on all occasions tried to avoid personal difficulties—and whilst I have never set myself up as possessing any extraordinary degree of bravery—whilst I have always been disposed to have things done quietly and peaceably—whilst I may have shuddered at times at the peril to which I might be exposed, and felt probably that I did not possess personal courage, yet I have something else far more valuable. I have pride, sir, and that alone might cause me to do what my reason might disapprove. Sir, much as I love this world; much as I am attached to friends and family; yes, Mr. Speaker, however, strong may be the ties that bind me to those I love, I prize honor infinitely above life. Sir, this thing, if suffered to go on in the way it has been going on this morning, might produce the very state of things I might be inclined to deprecate. Hence it was that I was anxious to take the floor, with a view of ascertaining from the gentleman from Maryland, whether it was really his intention to inflict on me a personal injury. It has ever been my custom, if I think an injury was intended me, to take it at the first hop. Things can be better settled that way, than if left to the interposition of friends. I shall proceed on the belief that the gentleman from Maryland, if convinced that he has done me injury, will, as an honorable man, repair that injury. Hence I am disposed to be prudent, and whilst addressing the gentleman, request him to believe that I mean nothing in intimidation in what I am saying. My purpose is to have myself righted—not to intimidate another. I know the gentleman too well to believe that he could be induced, under a threat or a menace, to repair an injury, which, on reflection, he might be convinced he has done me. I know him too well to believe that. I do not address him, then, with this view. The gentleman from Maryland has undertaken to say that certain members of this committee had been assailed by certain other members of the committee, when they would not assail certain other members. What is the inference? That the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH] were believed to be men who would not resent an injury done them. That was the inference to which the gentleman came, because he says the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS,] and the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. CRABB] who would probably defend themselves, had not been assailed; and that those who assailed the gentlemen from New York and Connecticut, were afraid to assail the gentlemen from Virginia and Alabama. That was the inference. Now, so far as regards myself, I have not assailed any one. Hence it was that the gentleman from Maryland throws himself in, not as a volunteer in the matter, as he says, but so it is, he comes out in defence of the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Connecticut. Now, sir, in defending these gentlemen, he has said many things upon this subject that are entirely unfounded in truth. I used this word, not in an offensive sense, because I have not asserted it in that sense, but because the gentleman has stated many things that are not sustained by the record. He however has not done this intentionally, I hope and believe, but because he is engaged in the consideration of a subject with which he is not acquainted. He, under a fancied necessity to protect men who cannot protect themselves, has volunteered to engage in the consideration of a subject when he knows no hing of it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman from Maryland, one thing said by him that was offensive to me, and wish him to determine whether I am mistaken in what he did say or not. In speaking about my course in relation to the Governor of New Jersey, and what I said of him, all of which I said I could prove at a proper time, the gentleman from Maryland said: Suppose the Governor of the old Commonwealth of Virginia were to return to this House one person as elected, and another person, meaning myself, were to come here under the return of the sheriff, would the gentleman from Virginia take his seat under that return? The gentleman asked, would I come here upon the returns of the sheriff, whose duty it is, under the laws of my State, to conduct the elections, when another person came here with the returns of the Governor, whose duty it is to make the returns.

Mr. JENIFER said a few words in reply, in too low a tone to be heard by the Reporter.

Mr. RIVES. Then, sir, I am mistaken entirely. I understood the gentleman to ask me if I would come here upon the return of the sheriff, when the Governor, whose duty it was to make the returns, gave his certificate to another person. I then gave a nod of assent, upon which it was stated to me that the gentleman then said that he believed the gentleman from Virginia would do any thing. Now, whether he did say this or not, I cannot undertake to say, and it is therefore that I wish him to explain what he did say. I did say that if the sheriff of the district in which I live, whose duty it is by law to conduct the elections, and to give his certificate to the person who receives a majority of the votes, furnished me with the evidence that I was elected, that I should come on and take my seat upon that evidence.

Then suppose the Governor of Virginia had done what the Governor of New Jersey has done—suppose he had returned my competitor instead of me; I having the majority of votes and the return of the sheriff, would have come here and claimed my seat. But see what this Governor of Virginia has done. Although the law of the Commonwealth requires him to return all those who shall be elected as Representatives for the State, he has not returned but one of the delegation from that State. If, then, I had waited for this broad seal—this commission of the Governor of Virginia—I would have come here without any title to my seat at all. I brought with me ample evidence of my election, and those gentlemen whose rights to seats I have been advocating, also brought evidence of their right to occupy them. Mr. Speaker, it has been said that we made a report in favor of those individuals, without having read the evidence on which it was founded. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] supposed a case as true, and asked the House what it would think of a report of a committee, if it should be adopted when the members of the committee had not read the evidence in relation to the matter? An attempt is now made to impress the public mind with the belief that the evidence had not been read. The journal, which is here, proves incontestably the falsehood of that charge. The journal is here, and before I take my seat, I shall insist on its being read. The House will see that it was not only read once, but twice; and that it was argued by the parties interested. Not only once, but twice has it been read; though it has been recently asserted that it had not been read at all.

Mr. Speaker, I feel very unwilling, after the House has been so kind to me, to undertake a speech at length at this particular time. I would prefer speaking hereafter. I would like to see how many of the gentlemen, who have occupied a certain ground heretofore, will abandon it before the subject closes.

However anxious I am to discuss it now, I must defer my remarks for another time, though I am unwilling to keep the people of Virginia in the dark, by a suppression of the facts, as has been asserted by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JENIFER.] I am anxious for the discussion to go on, in order that the people of Virginia, and the whole people of the United States, may know the true merits of the question. I want now to call prominently the attention of the people to this fact—that when the Committee of Elections determined that the consideration of the New Jersey question should be postponed until the 2d Monday of April, I then moved, in committee, that the chairman should ask leave of the House to have all the papers connected with the New Jersey case printed. The gentlemen of the Opposition voted against it, and it failed. I then gave notice that, inasmuch as we could not get that motion made by the chairman of the committee, I would, next morning, if I could get the floor, move for the instructions of the House to this effect. I not only did this, but I told the committee that I would make the same motion from day to day until it succeeded. I then made the proposition here, not to print certain papers, but ALL the papers. I made that proposition not only in the committee, but in the House.

Here Mr. GENTRY of Tennessee, and Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, called Mr. R. to order.

Mr. R. said the House had given him permission to go on, and he hoped he might do so without interruption.

Mr. GENTRY said the House had given the gentleman permission to make an explanation personal to himself, and he was now entering into the merits of the question.

Mr. R. resumed. That is the very point I am coming at now. I am charged with suppressing information, and being guilty of acts I am afraid to avow; and I want to show that all such charges are unfounded.

Mr. GENTRY said the House gave the gentleman permission to defend himself as a man of honor; but he was now defending himself as a politician and a public man.

Mr. RIVES. I have stated that I made two propositions to print not only certain papers, but the whole of them. And, on Friday last, I made the proposition not to print certain papers, but all the papers connected with the New Jersey case. I moved the postponement of the consideration of the report of the majority of the committee until the following Tuesday; then making it the special order of the day until the subject was finally disposed of, and, in the mean time, have all the evidence printed. Sir, the chairman of the committee [Mr. CAMPBELL] has, on two occasions, moved to have all the papers printed; and the gentlemen in the Opposition, more inclined to suppress the facts than I am, voted against a suspension of the rules for that purpose. Yes, sir, on six occasions I moved to print those papers; and yet I am charged by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] with a disposition to suppress the facts until the elections in Virginia are over. You, sir, know that the Legislature of our State proceeded in this matter, on receiving the resolutions of the Governor of New Jersey in relation to it. You know also that our party moved to send to the Governor of New Jersey for the evidence on which he made these charges, and that the Whig party in the Legislature would not consent to adopt the motion. I am delighted, in speaking of this good old State, to say that the Whig party there, ashamed of the ground that they had taken, had abandoned it. They knew that if they undertook to give such opinions without having all the evidence, that they would not be sustained by the people.

Here Mr BOTTS and several gentlemen called Mr. R. to order, and the noise was such that the Reporters could not hear his remarks.

And the SPEAKER said that the rules had been suspended to enable the gentleman from Virginia to make an explanation, and he could go on.

Mr. WISE wished to say that if his colleague was permitted to proceed, and talk of his (Mr. W's) friends, who were absent in Richmond, that he wished to have an opportunity of replying to him.

Mr. GENTRY called Mr. RIVES to order, and asked that the gentleman from Virginia might take his seat till the point of order was decided.

The CHAIR called upon the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GENTRY] to reduce his point of order to writing.

Mr. GENTRY said, that at the request of several friends around him, he would withdraw it.

Mr. BOTTS renewed it. I moved to suspend the rules, to enable the gentleman to make a personal explanation, when he asked if he had a friend here that would move it. I insist upon it that he be confined to the explanation personal between himself and the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JENIFER.]

Mr. WELLER observed that there were several gentlemen besides the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOTTS,] who moved the suspension of the rules to enable the gentleman's colleague to make his explanation.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BEATTY] moved the suspension of the rules.

Mr. BYNUM hoped the gentleman would write out his point of order.

Mr. BOTTS then, at the request of the CHAIR, wrote out his point of order, in substance as follows: The rules having been suspended for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Virginia to make an explanation personal to himself, and after the House had refused to suspend the rules for the purpose of discussing the general merits of the New Jersey election, he submitted whether he was in order to discuss the general merits of the New Jersey election, and the proceedings of the Governor and Legislature of Virginia on this subject.

The CHAIR was of opinion that the gentleman was not in order in so doing.

Mr. RIVES proceeded, and made a few remarks, and from the number of calls to order, and the confusion, it was impossible for the Reporter to hear.

Order having been restored,

Mr. RIVES continued: Now, with all proper respect, I ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] whether he said what I understood he did say, "that I would do any thing."

It was stated to me that, when he was speaking some days ago, he inquired if I would come on here and claim my seat under the return of a sheriff, while my competitor came on with the return of the Governor. I nodded assent. I have since understood that he said I would do any thing. I hope he will see the impropriety of such an expression, and I now ask him if he used it.

Mr. JENIFER said a few words in reply, which were not heard. He was understood, however, to say that he wished the gentleman to bring out all his indictments at once. If this, however, was all, he would with pleasure reply to it.

Mr. RIVES said. There were many remarks made by the gentleman, that I thought the facts of the case would not justify. I was, however, disposed to let other matters pass over, because they were levelled generally at the party with which I act; but this particular question, it seemed, was levelled at me personally.

Mr. JENIFER said he was happy in having an opportunity to make an explanation to the gentleman. He was gratified, also, for another reason; because, since he had commenced his remarks this morning, he had seen a charge made against him, whether official or not he would not pretend to say: that, on a motion to print, Mr. JENIFER obtained the floor, and had occupied it every morning since, without giving the Republican members an opportunity to reply to it. In reply to this, he had never refused to yield the floor to any gentleman to make an explanation. Now, in regard to the gentleman from Virginia, he would answer him; and, in doing so, he would do it frankly, for the gentleman had disclaimed any intention of menace. The case he supposed a few days ago, was this: that if the Governor of Virginia were to give his certificate to the person having a majority of the votes that he was elected, and the sheriff were to give his certificate to the gentleman, he having a minority of the votes; and in that he inquired of him if he would come here and claim his seat. He wished it to be distinctly understood that if the gentleman believed the giving of a certificate to a man who had a minority of the votes was evidence of fraud, that the gentleman himself has answered the question. If the gentleman would satisfy him that he would not act in that way, as he understood him to say that he would by his nod of assent, when he stated the case he had just cited, it would give him pleasure to disclaim the offensive allusion to him.

Mr. RIVES. I thought the gentleman was supposing my own case. I received a majority of several hundred votes over my competitor. Now, in Virginia, it is the duty of, the sheriff to conduct the elections, and to give to the person having a majority of the votes a certificate that he is elected, at the same time sending a duplicate of the same certificate to the Governor. The law then makes it the duty of the Governor to give his returns to the person who has thus received the certificate of the sheriff. This being the state of the facts, I supposed that the gentleman was stating my own case, and believing that he inquired of me whether I, having received a majority of the votes, would come here and claim my seat upon the return of the sheriff, when my competitor, who received a minority of the votes, came here and claimed it upon the return of the Governor. Believing this to be the case supposed by the gentleman, I nodded assent that I would.

Mr. JENIFER said that he had wholly misapprehended the gentleman from Virginia, and that that gentleman had also misapprehended him. When he urged the expression the gentleman complained of, he understood him as saying that he would come on and claim his seat on the certificate of the sheriff, although he had a minority of the votes. As he now understood the gentleman's meaning, it gave him pleasure to disclaim any application of the expressions to him.

Mr. WISE hoped the House would now drop this matter. There was evidently nothing between the two gentlemen requiring further explanation. It was plain that they misunderstood each other. It was point no point, and there was nothing further between them. He hoped the House would proceed to the orders of the day.

The discussion having here ended,

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Navy Department, enclosing printed copies of the Navy Register.

Also, the following communication from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives, in answer to a resolution of that body, dated on the 9th instant, the enclosed report of the Secretary of State. M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, D. C. March 12, 1840.

To the President of the United States:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, March 12, 1840.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred a resolution of the House of Representatives, dated the 9th instant, requesting the President to communicate to that body "whether any, and, if any, what measures have been taken, since the rejection of the recommendation of the King of Holland, of a new line of boundary between the United States and the province of New Brunswick, to obtain information in respect to the topography of the territory in dispute, by a survey or exploration of the same on the part of the United States alone; and also whether any measures have been adopted whereby the accuracy of the survey lately made under the authority of the British Government, when communicated, may be tested or examined," has the honor to report to the President that no steps have been thought necessary by this Government since the date above referred to, to obtain topographical information regarding the disputed territory, either by exploration or survey, on its part alone; nor has it thought proper to adopt any measures to test the accuracy of the topographical examination recently made by a British commissioner, the result of which has not been made public, or communicated to the United States.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN FORSYTH.

On motion of Mr. EVANS,

Ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Several bills from the Senate on the SPEAKER's table were twice read, and appropriately committed.

Mr. MONTGOMERY moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. R. GARLAND demanded the yeas and nays, which were not ordered, and the question being put and carried in the affirmative,

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, March 16, 1840.

DUTIES, DRAWBACKS, AND ALLOWANCES.

Mr. BENTON rose to make the motion for which he had given notice on Friday last, for leave to bring in a bill to reduce the drawbacks allowed on the exportation of rum and refined sugars; and the bounties and allowances to fishing vessels, in proportion to the reduction which had been made, and should be made, in the duties upon imported sugars, molasses and salt, upon which these bounties and allowances were respectively granted.

Mr. B. said that the bill, for the bringing in of which he was about to ask leave, proposed some material alteration in the act of 1833, for the modification of the tariff, commonly called the compromise act; and as that act was held by its friends to be sacred and inviolable, and entitled to run its course untouched and unaltered, it became his duty to justify his bill in advance; to give reasons for it before he ventured to submit the question of leave for its introduction; and to show, beforehand, that there was great and just cause for the measure he proposed.

Mr. B. said it would be recollected, by those who were cotemporary with the event, and might be seen by all who should now look into our legislative history of that day, that he was thoroughly opposed to the passage of the act of 1833; that he preferred waiting the progress of Mr. Verplanck's bill; that he opposed the compromise act, from beginning to end; made speeches against it, which were not answered; uttered predictions of it, which were disregarded; proposed amendments to it, which were rejected; showed it to be an adjournment, not a settlement, of the tariff question; and voted against it, on its final passage, in a respectable minority of eighteen* It was not his intention at this time to recapitulate all the objections which he then made to the act; but to confine himself to two of those objections, and to those two of them, the truth and evils of which TIME had developed; and for which evils the public good demands an immediate remedy to be applied. He spoke of the drawbacks and allowances founded upon duties, which duties were to undergo periodical reductions, while the drawbacks and allowances remained undiminished; and of the vague and arbitrary tenor of the act, which rendered it incapable of any regular, uniform, or safe execution. He should confine himself to these two objections; and proceed to examine them in the order in which they were mentioned.

At page 208 of the Senate journal, session of 1832–33, is seen this motion: "Moved by Mr. BENTON to add to the bill a section in the following words: 'That all drawbacks allowed on the exportation of articles manufactured in the United States from materials imported from foreign countries, and subject to duty, shall be reduced in proportion to the reduction of duties provided for in this act.'" The particular application of this clause, as explained and enforced at the time, was to sugar and molasses, and the refined sugar, and the rum manufactured from them. As the laws then stood, and according to the principle of all drawbacks, the exporter of these refined sugars and rum were allowed to draw back from the Treasury precisely as much money as had been paid into the Treasury on the importation of the article out of which the exported article was manufactured. This was the principle, and this was the law; and so rigidly was this insisted upon by the manufacturing and exporting interest, that only four years before the compromise act, namely, in 1829, the drawback on refined sugars exported was raised from four to five cents a pound upon the motion of Mr. DICKERSON, a then Senator from New Jersey; and this upon an argument and a calculation made by him to show that the quantity of raw sugar contained in every pound of refined sugar, had in reality paid five instead of four cents duty. The argument in favor of my motion appeared to me to be palpable and irresistible; and its success the more certain, as it was supported by Mr. DICKERSON himself, the gentleman who had paid most attention to the details of the manufacturing interest, and on whose motion it was that, only four years before, the drawback on refined sugars exported had been increased one cent on the pound, in order to make the drawback and the duty precisely the same. My motion appeared to me self-evidently just, as the new act in abolishing all specific duties, and reducing every thing to an ad valorem duty of twenty per centum, would reduce the duties on sugar and molasses eventually to the one-third or the one-fourth of their then amount; and, unless the drawback should be proportionately reduced, the exporter of refined sugars and rum, instead of drawing back the exact amount he had paid into the Treasury, would in reality draw back three or four times as much as had been paid in. This would be unjust in itself; and, besides being unjust, would involve a breach of the Constitution: for, so much of the drawback as was not founded upon the duty, would be a naked bounty paid for nothing out of the Treasury. I expected my motion to be adopted by a unanimous vote; on the contrary, it was rejected by a vote of 24 to 18; and I had to leave it to TIME, that slow, but sure witness, to develope the evils which my arguments had been unable to show, and to enforce the remedies which the vote of the Senate had rejected. That witness has come. TIME, with his unerring testimony, has arrived. The act of 1833 has run the greater part of its course, without having reached its ultimate depression of duties, or developed its greatest mischiefs; but it has gone far enough to show that it has done immense injury to the Treasury, and must continue to do it if a remedy is not applied. Always indifferent to my rhetoric, and careful of my facts—always leaving oratory behind, and laboring to establish a battery of facts in front—I have applied at the fountain head of information—the Treasury Department—for all the statistics connected with the subject; and the successive reports which had been received from that Department, on the salt duties and the fishing bounties and allowances, and on the sugar and molasses duties, and the drawbacks on exported rum and refined sugar, and which had been printed by the order of the Senate, had supplied the information which constituted the body of facts which must carry conviction to the mind of every hearer.

Mr. B. said he would take up the sugar duties first, and show what had been the operation of the act of 1833, in relation to the revenue from that article, and the drawbacks founded upon it. In document No. 275, laid upon our tables on Friday last, we find four tables in relation to this point, and a letter from the Register of the Treasury, Mr. T. L. Smith, describing their contents. The latter says:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Register's Office, March 10, 1840.

SIR: I herewith transmit statements Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4, prepared in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the United States of the 30th of December, 1839.

Statement No. 1. exhibits the operation of the act of the 21st of January, 1829, in relation to drawback on refined sugar, and estimated with its bearing on the revenue annually, from 1839 to 1843; assuming as data the drawback payable in 1839.

Statement No. 2 exhibits what the operation would have been, provided the act of the 2d March, 1833, had made provision for a reduction of the drawback in proportion to the biennial reduction of duty; assuming the same data as in the preceding statement.

Statement No. 3 exhibits the product of the duties which accrued on brown sugar manufactured into refined; the drawback payable on the refined exported, annually; and the rate per centum which the drawback payable has been upon the duties from 1829 to 1839, and estimated for the annual result to 1843, based upon the calculations of the year 1839.

Statement No. 4 exhibits the drawback paid annually from 1833 to 1839, estimated upon the basis of the year 1839, and is extended to 1843, showing what would have been the biennial reduction, what the amount of drawback payable, and in cents and hundredths the rate per pound, had the act of the 2d March, 1833, provided for such reduction.

In conformity with the aforesaid resolution, I furnish tables A, B, C, and D, in relation to spirits distilled from molasses, prepared upon similar principles as those relating to refined sugar.

The year 1839 has been taken as the basis of calculation for the succeeding years to 1843, showing the operation of the reduction of duty and drawback payable. Statement E is a recapitulation and comparison of the preceding statements.

I am, sir, most respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
T. L. SMITH.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

These tables are all valuable. The whole of the information which they contain is useful, and is applicable to the business of legislation, and go to enlighten us on the subject under consideration; but it is not in my power, continued Mr. B. to quote them in detail. Results and prominent facts only can be selected; and, proceeding on this plan, I here show to the Senate, from table No. 1, that as early as the year 1837—being only four years after the compromise act—the drawback paid on the exportation of refined sugar actually exceeded the amount of revenue derived from imported sugar, by the sum of $861 71. As the duties continued to diminish, and the drawback remained the same, this excess was increased in 1838 to $12,690; and in 1839 it was increased to $20,154 37. Thus far the results are mathematical; they are copied from the Treasury books; they show the actual operation of the compromise act on this article down to the end of the last year. The table then goes on to show the prospective operation of the act for the remainder of the time which it has to run, and which will include the great reductions of duty which are to take place in 1841 and 1842; and here the results become still more striking. Assuming the importation of each succeeding year to be the same that it was in 1839, and the excess of the drawback over the duties will be, for 1840, $37,343 38; for 1841, the same; for 1842, $114,693 94; and for 1843, the sum of $140, 477 45. These will be the bounties payable out of the Treasury in the present, and in the three succeeding years, provided the importation of sugars shall be the same that it was in 1839; but will it be the same? To this question, both reason and experience answer in the negative. They both reply that the importation will increase in proportion to the increased profit which the increasing difference between the duty and the drawback will afford; and this reply is proved by the two first columns in the table under consideration. These columns show that, under the encouragement to importation already afforded by the compromise act, the import of sugar increased in six years from 1,558,971 pounds, costing $72,336, to 11,308,561 pounds, costing $554,119. Here was an enormous increase under a small inducement compared to that which is to follow; so that we have reason to conclude that the importations of the present and ensuing years, unless checked by the passage of the bill which I propose to bring in, will not only increase in the ratio of the past years, but far beyond it; and will in reality be limited only by the capacity of the world to supply the demand: so great will be the inducement to import raw or clayed sugars, and export refined. The effect upon our Treasury must be great. Several hundred thousand dollars per annum must be taken from it for nothing; the whole exacted from the Secretary of the Treasury in hard money; his reports having shown us that, while paper money, and even depreciated paper, is systematically pressed upon the Government in payment of duties, nothing but gold and silver will be received back in payment of drawbacks. But it is not the Treasury only that would suffer: the consumers of sugar would come in for their share of the burthen: the drawback will keep up the price; and the home consumer must pay the drawback as well as the Government: otherwise the refined sugar will seek a foreign market. The consumers of brown sugar will suffer in the same manner; for the manufacturers will monopolize it, and refine it, and have their five cents drawback either at home or abroad. Add to all this, it will be well if enterprising dealers shall not impose domestic sugars upon the manufacturers, and thus convert the home crop into an article entitled to drawback.

Such are the mischiefs of the act of 1833 in relation to this article; they are great already, and still greater are yet to come. As early as 1837, the whole amount of the sugar revenue, and $861,71 besides, was delivered over to some twenty odd manufacturers of refined sugars! At this day, the whole amount of that revenue goes to these few individuals, and $37,343,38 besides. This is the case this year. Henceforth they are to receive the whole amount of this revenue, with some hundreds of thousands of dollars besides, to be drawn from other branches of revenue, unless this bill is passed which I propose to bring in. This is the effect of the act, dignified with the name of compromise, and hallowed by the imputed character of sacred and inviolable! It turns over a tax levied from seventeen millions of people on an article of essential comfort, and almost a necessary; it turns over this whole tax to a few individuals; and that not being enough to satisfy their demand, they receive the remainder from the National Treasury! It violates the Constitution to the whole extent of the excess of the drawback over the duty. It subjects the Treasury to an unforeseen amount of undue demands. It deprives the people of the whole benefit of the reduction of the sugar tax, provided for by the act itself; and subjects them to the mercies of those who may choose to monopolize the article for refinement and exportation. The whole number of persons into whose hands all this money and power is thrown, is, according to a statement derived from Gov. Wolf, the late collector of the customs at Philadelphia, no more than own the 29 sugar refineries; the whole of which, omitting some small ones in the West, and three in New Orleans, are situate on the north side of Mason and Dixon's line!

Referring Senators to the tables marked 2, 3, and 4, and especially to the latter, for more detailed information on the subject of the sugar tax and drawback, Mr. B. would proceed to the next article to the effect upon which, of the compromise act, he would wish to call their attention; and that article was imported molasses, and its manufacture, in the shape of exported rum. On this article, and its manufacture, the operation of the act was of the same character, though not to the same degree, that it was on sugars; the duties were reduced, while the drawback remained the same. The importation of molasses for the year 1833 was 81,402 gallons; the cost was $14,872; the duties were $4,070; and the drawback, $2,960. In 1839, the same items, were: importation, 392,368 gallons; the cost, $37,601; the duties, $18,048; and the drawback, $13,125. Thus, up to the present time, the drawback, though gaining upon the duty, has not overtaken it; and will not (upon the assumption of the importation of 1839 for the importation of ensuing years) until the year 1843. In that year, assuming the importation to be 392,368 gallons of molasses, and the cost to be $37,601, the duties will amount to $14,384, and the drawback on exported rums will be $14,267. This would be a payment of the whole amount of the molasses tax to the rum distillers; it would be the taxing of seventeen millions of people on their molasses for the sole benefit of a few hundred rum distillers, the whole of whom are resident to the north of Mason and Dixon's line. This would be bad enough, though not so bad as in the case of the sugar tax. So far as the absurdity of taxing a nation in an article of common comfort, for the benefit of a few individuals—so far as this absurdity was concerned, it would be on a par with the sugar tax: so far as the violation of the Constitution is concerned in substituting a premium for a drawback, it would still be on a par with it: so far as a monopoly of a common comfort of life was concerned, it would still be of the same character: and, so far as drawing upon other sources of revenue would be concerned, it would approximate slightly to the evils of the sugar tax; for it is very certain that the importation of molasses, and exportation of rum (to say nothing of frauds) will increase as the duties become less; and that the importation of 1843, and even of 1841 and 1842, and far exceed that of 1839; and thus create a demand upon the Treasury for a larger amount of drawback on exported rum than the duty on imported molasses would pay. All this is very clear without any fraud in the case. But are we to escape frauds in a case where the commission of them is so easy, the temptation so great, and the detection so difficult? If we are, we shall be more fortunate than we have been heretofore, and that under the circumstances of a less temptation. It is well known that whiskey can be converted into New England rum, and exported as such, and receive the drawback of the molasses duty; and that this has been done just as often as the price of whiskey (and the meanest would answer the purpose) was less than the cost of molasses. The process was this. Purchase base whiskey at a low rate—filtrate it through charcoal, to deprive it of smell and taste—then pass it through a rum distillery, in company with a little real rum—and the whiskey would come out rum, very fit to be sold as such at home, or exported as such with the benefit of drawback. All this has been done, and has been proved to be done; and, therefore, may be done again, and certainly will be done, under the increased temptation which the compromise act now affords, and will continue to afford, if not amended as proposed by the bill I propose to bring in. It was proved before a committee of the House of Representatives in the session of 1827-8. Mr. Jeromus Johnson, then a member of Congress from the city of New York, now a custom house officer in that city, testified directly to the fact. To the question: "Are there not large quantities of whiskey used with molasses in the distillation of what is called new rum?" He answered: "There are." That whiskey is now used for that purpose, is clearly established by the table marked B. That table shows that the importation of foreign molasses for the year 1839 was 392,368 gallons; and the exportation of distilled rum for that quantity was 356,699 gallons; that is to say, nearly as many gallons of rum went out as of molasses came in; and, admitting that a gallon of good molasses will make a gallon of rum, yet the average is below it. Inferior or common molasses falls short of producing gallon for gallon by from 5 to 7½ per cent. Now make an allowance for this deficiency; allow also for the quantity of foreign molasses consumed in the United States in other ways; allow likewise for the quantity of rum made from molasses, and not exported, but consumed at home: allow for these three items, and the conviction becomes irresistible, that whiskey was used in the distillation of rum in the year 1839, and exported with the benefit of drawback! But, lest it should be objected that a single year is not a fair test, I will take three years together: I will take the three last years; and will show that the result is the same for each—that the exportation of rum nearly equals the importation of molasses for each year. The three years in question stand thus:

	Molasses imported. Gallons.	Rum exported. Gallons.
1837	128,246	116,588
1838	236,216	214,742
1839	392,368	356,699

The results are the same in each year; and they announce the fact that something else besides molasses is a material used for the manufacture of this rum. That material is whiskey—base whiskey—the cheapest which can be made, or bought; and, whenever costing less by the gallon than molasses, it is accordingly bought for distillation into rum for exportation. This has been done heretofore; it is done now; and will continue to be done more largely than ever under the additional inducements afforded by the compromise act.

I pass to the third item mentioned in the bill—the fishing bounties and allowances—and which I propose to reduce in proportion to the reduction which the salt duty has undergone and is to undergo.

And here I am met by a question, whether these allowances ars founded upon the salt duty, and should rise and fall with it, or are independent of that tax, and can be kept up without it? I hold the affirmative of this question. I hold that the allowances rest upon the duty, and upon nothing else but the duty, and there is neither LAW nor CONSTITUTION to support them on any other principle. This is what I hold; but I should not have noticed the question at this time, except for the issue joined upon it between the Senator from Massachusetts who sits farther on the other side [Mr. DAVIS] and myself. He and I have made up an issue on this point; and, without going into the argument at this time, I will cite him to the original petition from the Massachusetts Legislature, asking for a drawback of the duties, or, as they styled it, "a remission of duties on all the dutiable articles used in the fisheries; and also premiums and bounties; and to half a dozen acts of Congress which PROVE my position, hoping that these may be sufficient; but promising to come down upon him with an avalanche of AUTHORITIES, if they are not.

The dutiable articles used in the fisheries, and of which a remission of duty was asked, calculated on a vessel of sixty-five tons, for one season, were:

On salt - - - -	$80 25
On rum - - - -	14 00
On tea - - - -	2 64
On sugar - - -	3 03
On molasses - - -	99
On coarse woollens - -	7 33
On lines, lead, and hooks -	2 09
On sail cloth - - -	2 05
On cordage, cables, &c. - -	20 00
On tonnage - - -	3 09
On iron - - - -	1 00
	$138 00

This petition, presented to Congress in the year 1790, was referred to the Secretary of State [Mr. JEFFERSON] for a report upon it; and his report was, "that a drawback of duties ought to be allowed to the fishermen on the articles used in their calling," and that "the fisheries are not to draw support from the Treasury." This report was sanctioned by the immediate action of Congress, and has governed every law that has been made upon the subject. Confining my quotations from acts of Congress to the main article used by fishermen, and paying duty, namely, salt, I shall proceed to show what the legislation of Congress has been upon it; and, in doing so, shall show that the salt duty, from 1790 to the present day, has constituted the sole foundation for the fishing bounties and allowances; and that the two have constantly risen together, and fallen together, inseparable in their life and in their death.

1. The first act is that of 1789, the same which imposed a duty of six cents a bushel on salt, and which granted a bounty of five cents a barrel on pickled fish exported, and also on beef and pork exported, and five cents a quintal on dried fish exported; and declared these bounties to be "in lieu of a drawback of the duties imposed on the importation of the salt employed and expended therein."

This act is itself decisive of the whole question. In the first place it declares the bounty to be in lieu of a drawback of the salt duty. In the second place, it conforms to the principle of all drawbacks, and only grants the bounty on that portion of the fish which shall be exported. In the third place, it gives the same bounty, and in the same words, to the exporters of salted beef and pork, which is given to the exporters of fish: and certainly mariners were not expected to be created among the raisers of swine and cattle!

2. In 1790 the duty on salt was doubled; it was raised from six to twelve cents a bushel: by the same act the fishing and provision bounties and allowances were also doubled: they were raised from five to ten cents the barrel and the quintal. By this act the bounties and allowances both to fish and provisions were described to be "in lieu of drawback of the duty on salt used in curing fish and provisions exported." Vol. 2, chap. 2, Laws United States.

3. The act of 1792 repeals "the bounty in lieu of drawback on DRIED fish," and "in lieu of that, and as a COMMUTATION thereof, and EQUIVALENT therefor," shifts the bounty from the quintal of dried fish to the tonnage of the fishing vessel, and changes its name from BOUNTY to ALLOWANCE. This is the key act to the present system of tonnage allowance to the fishing vessel, and was passed upon the petition of the fishermen, and to enable the crew of the vessel to draw the bounty instead of letting it fall into the hands of the exporting merchant. It was done upon the fishermen's petition, and for that purpose; and to exclude all idea of considering this change as a change of policy, and that the allowance was now to become a bounty from the Treasury for the encouragement of a nursery for seamen, the act went on to make this precise and explicit declaration: "That the allowance so granted to the fishing vessel was a commutation of, and an equivalent for, the bounty in lieu of drawback of the duties imposed on the importation of the salt used in curing the fish exported." Vol 2, chap. 2, Laws United States.

4. In 1797 the duty on salt was raised from twelve cents to twenty cents a bushel: by the same act a corresponding rise was made in the bounties to exported salted provisions and pickled fish, and in the allowance to fishing vessels. The salt duty was raised one-third; and these bounties and allowances were raised one-third. Thirty three and one-third per cent. was added all round; and the act was explicit in again styling the bounties and allowances as a commutation in lieu of the drawback of the salt duty. Vol. 3, chap. 176, Laws United States.

5. The act of April 12, 1800, continues the salt duty, and with it continues all the bounties to salted provisions and pickled fish exported, and all the allowances to fishing vessels, for the term of ten years; and then adds this proviso: "That these allowances shall not be understood to be continued for a longer time than the correspondent duties on salt, respectively, for which the said allowances were granted, shall be payable." Such are the terms of the act of the year 1800. It is a clincher. It nails up every thing. It shows that Congress was determined that the salt duty and the bounties and the allowances should be one and indivisible; that they should come and go together—should rise and fall together—should live and die together. It may be seen in volume 3, chapter 176, of the Laws of the United States.

6. In 1807, Mr. Jefferson being President, the salt tax was abolished upon his recommendation; and with it all the bounties and allowances to fishing vessels, to pickled fish, and to salted beef and pork, were all swept away. The same act abolished the whole. The first section repealed the salt duty; the second repealed the bounties and allowances; the salt duty was to cease on the first day of January, 1808, and the bounties and allowances ceased on the same day. The second section of the act declares:

"That from and after the first day of January next, so much of any act as allows a bounty on exported salt provisions and pickled fish, in lieu of drawback of the duties on the salt employed in curing the same, and so much of any act as makes allowances to the owners and crews of fishing vessels, in lieu of drawback of the duties paid on the salt used in the same, shall be, and the same hereby is, repealed."

This was the end of the first salt tax in the the United States, and of all the bounties and allowances built upon it. It fell under the Republican administration of Mr. Jefferson, and with the unanimous vote of every Republican, and also with the votes of many of the Federalists. The journal of the House of Representatives shows that there were but five votes against the passage of the repealing bill, and these were Messrs. Isaac L. Green and Josiah Quincy, of Massachusetts; Gordon S Mumford, of New York; Nathan Williams, of New Jersey; and Eliphalet Wickes, of Maryland. These were the whole who voted against the repeal; and of all the members of the House present, there was not ONE who suggested that the fishing bounties and allowances were independent of the salt duty, or ought to be continued one instant after that duty was repealed.

7. After this, for six years, there was no salt tax, and no fishing bounty or allowance in the United States. The two th measures—the tax, and its offspring—slept toge er in the tomb from 1807 to 1813. The war revived them, and revived them together; and the bill which restored them to life, condemned them to death within one year after the termination of the war. Before that year was out, the tax and the bounties and allowances founded upon it, were continued until repealed by Congress; and it is that act which is now in force. The very act, then, which now keeps alive the fishing bounties and allowances, brought them into existence as an appendage to the salt duty—as its natural product, and inseparable companion—and all that we have to do is to repeal the salt act of 1813, and the fishing bounties and allowances are left without a law to support them—so thoroughly and indissolubly are they connected together; so mutually and entirely are they dependent upon each other.

Mr. B. said the fishing bounties and allowances were granted upon petitions from Massachusetts fifty years ago. The fishing interest asked four things: 1. A remission of duties on the articles used in their calling, of which salt was the chief; 2. A bounty out of the Treasury, in imitation of the British bounties; 3. These benefits to be granted to the whale ships; 4. To be granted to the cod and mackerel fisheries. Of these four applications, Congress granted two: namely, the remission of duties on salt, in the shape of bounty and allowance; and this relief to the mackerel and cod fisheries, not the whale fisheries. Mr. B. relied upon this to show that encouragement to mariners was no part of the object of the fishing bounties and allowances. Not a cent had ever gone to the whale ships: they had only gone to the cod and mackerel fisheries. The noble whaler of four or five hundred tons, with her ample crew, which sailed twenty thousand miles, doubling a most tempestuous cape, before she arrived at her field of operations—which remained out three years, waging actual war with the monsters of the deep—a war in which a brave heart, a steady eye, and an iron nerve, was as much wanted as in any battle with man—this noble whaler got nothing: it all went to the cod and mackerel fisheries, which were carried on in small vessels, some as small as five tons, and in the rivers and along the coasts, and on the banks of New Foundland, and where nothing but the hook and line was used. Enterprising, hardy, and meritorious as these hook and line fishermen might be, they were not to be compared as mariners, nor their business as nursing seamen to be compared to the whalers and whalemen. Yet these latter received no part of the bounties and allowances; and the reason was because they did not pay duties on imimported salt.

Mr. B. here read an article from the New Hampshire Gazette, of March 9th, published at Portsmouth, to show that the view he took of the fishing bounties and allowances, as founded upon the salt duties, was sustained by that paper, and also by the community; that all attempts to get up an excitement among the fishermen had failed at the election of March, 1838, and would fail at the impending election, (which they did;) that the fishermen knew that the bounties and allowances were founded upon the salt tax; that they rose and fell with that duty; and that they were too just to desire the allowancies without the duties, and had too much regard to the rest of the Union to desire the whole country to be taxed in their salt on their account.

After a just tribute to the integrity and firmness of the fishermen, in resisting this attempt at a little fish panic, and a compliment to the New Hampshire Gazette, the oldest newspaper in the State, Mr. B. said: I here rest my statutory citations on this subject. I have done nothing but cite statutes to establish my position; and surely I have cited enough. If not, and the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] or any other Senator, shall wish to hear any thing more, I pledge myself to gratify him. I pledge myself to take up the question, and to go through with it; to pile law upon law, authority upon authority, and reason upon reason, until every objection shall be crushed under their weight, and the last doubt expunged from the mind of every Senator. I pledge myself to prove the point to their satisfaction, and that both negatively and affirmatively: negatively, that the fishing bounties and allowances NEVER were granted as encouragement to a nursery of seamen; and affirmatively, that they were granted in lieu of a drawback of the salt duty, and, as a commutation thereof, and an equivalent therefor, and then I will do more: I will prove that, constitutionally, these allowances can only be justified on the principle of a drawback.

I now come to the clause in my bill which has called forth these preliminary remarks; the third clause, which proposes the reduction of fishing bounties and allowances in proportion to the reduction of fishing bounties and allowances in proportion to the reduction which the salt tax has undergone, and shall undergo. And here, it is not the compromise act alone that is to be blamed: a previous act shares that censure with it. In 1830 the salt duty was reduced one half, to take effect in 1830 and 1831; the fishing bounties and allowances should have been reduced one-half at the same time. I made the motion in the Senate to that effect; but it failed of success. When the compromise act was passed in 1833, and provided for a further reduction of the salt duty—a reduction which has now reduced it two-thirds, and in 1841 and '42 will reduce it still lower—when this act was passed, a reduction of the fishing bounties and allowances should have taken place. The two Senators who concocted that act in their chambers, and brought it here to be registered as the royal edicts were registered in the times of the old French monarchy; when these two Senators concocted this act, they should have inserted a provision in it for the correspondent reduction of the fishing bounties and allowances with the salt tax: they should have placed these allowances, and the refined sugar, and the rum drawbacks, all on the same footing, and reduced them all in proportion to the reduction of the duties on the articles on which they were founded. They did not do this. They omitted the whole; with what mischief you have already seen in the case of rum and refined sugar, and shall presently see in the case of the fishing bounties and allowances. I attempted to supply a part of their omission in making the motion in relation to drawbacks, which was read to you at the commencement of these remarks. Failing in that motion, I made no further attempt, but waited for TIME, the great arbiter of all questions, to show the mischief, and to enforce the remedy. That arbiter is now here, with his proofs in his hand, in the shape of certain reports from the Treasury Department in relation to the salt duty and the fishing bounties and allowances, which have been printed by the order of the Senate, and constitute part of the salt document, No. 196. From that document I now proceed to collect the evidences of one branch of the mischief—the pecuniary branch of it—which the omission to make the proper reductions in these allowances has inflicted upon the country.

The salt duty was reduced one fourth in the year 1831; the fishing bounties and allowances that year were $313,894; they should have been reduced one fourth also, which would have made them about $160,000. In 1832 the duty was reduced one half; the fishing bounties and allowances were paid in full, and amounted to $234,137; they should have been reduced one half; and then $117,018 would have discharged them. The compromise act was made in 1833, and, under the operation of that act, the salt duty has undergone biennial reductions until it is now reduced to about one third of its original amount: if it had provided for the correspondent reduction of the fishing bounties and allowances, there would have been saved from that year to the year 1839—the last to which the returns have been made up—an annual average sum of about $150,000; or a gross sum of about $900,000. The prospective loss can only be estimated; but it is to increase rapidly, owing to the large reductions in the salt duty in the years 1841 and 1842.

The present year, 1840, lacks but a little of exhausting the whole amount of the salt revenue in paying the fishing bounties and allowances; the next year will take more than the whole; and the year after will require about double the amount of the salt revenue of that year to be taken from other branches of the revenue to satisfy the demands of the fishing vessels. The results for the present year, and the ensuing ones, are of course computed: they are computations founded upon the basis of the last ascertained year's operations. The last year to which all the heads of this branch of business is made up, is the year 1838; and for that year they stand thus: Salt imported, in round numbers, seven millions of bushels; nett revenue from it, about $430,000; fishing bounties and allowances, $320,000. Assuming the importation of the present year to be the same, and the bounties and allowances to be the same, the loss to the Treasury will be $206,000; for the salt duty this year will undergo a further reduction. In 1842, when this duty has reached its lowest point, the whole amount of revenue derived from it is computed at about $170,000, while the fishing bounties and allowances continuing the same, namely, about $320,000, the salt revenue in the gross will be little more than half enough to pay it; and, after deducting the weighers' and measurers' fees, which come out of the Treasury, and amount to $52,500 on an importation of seven millions; after deducting this item, there will be a deficiency of about $200,000 in the salt revenue, in meeting the drawbacks, in the shape of bounties and allowances founded upon it. Thus two-thirds of the whole amount of the salt revenue is at this time paid to the fishing vessels. Next year it will all go to them; and after 1842, we shall have to raise money from other sources to the amount of $200,000 per annum, or raise the salt duty itself to produce that amount, in order to satisfy these drawbacks, which were permitted to take the form of bounties and allowances to fishing vessels. Such is the operation of the compromise act! that act which is styled sacred and inviolable!

Of the other mischiefs resulting from this compromise act, which reduced the duties on salt, and the one which preceded it for the same purpose, without reducing the correspondent bounties and allowances to the fishing interest—of these remaining mischiefs, whereof there are many, I mean to mention but one; and merely to mention that, and not to argue it. It is the constitutional objection to the payment of any thing beyond the duty received—the payment of any thing which exceeds the drawback of the duty. Up to that point, I admit the constitutionality of drawbacks, whether passing under that name, or changed to the name of a bounty, or an allowance in lieu of drawback. I admit the constitutional right of Congress to permit a drawback of the amount paid in. I deny the constitutional right to permit a drawback of any amount beyond what was paid in. This is my position, which I pledge myself to maintain, if any one disputes it; and applying this principle to the fishing bounties and allowances, and also to the drawbacks in the case of refined sugars and rum: and I boldly affirm that the Constitution of the United States has been in a state of flagrant violation, under the compromise act, from the day of its passage to the present hour, and will continue so until the bill is passed which I am about to ask leave to bring in.

Sir, I quit this part of my subject with presenting, in a single picture, the condensed view of what I have been detailing: It is that the whole annual revenue derived from SUGAR, SALT, and MOLASSES, is delivered over gratuitously to a few thousand persons in a particular section of the Union, and is not even sufficient to satisfy their demands! In other words, that a tax upon a nation of seventeen millions of people, upon three articles of universal consumption, articles of necessity, and of comfort, is laid for the benefit of a few dozen rum distillers and sugar refiners, and a few thousand fishermen; and not being sufficient for them, the deficit, amounting to many hundred thousand dollars per annum, is taken from other branches of the revenue, and presented to them! and all this the effect of act which was made out of doors, which was not permitted to be amended on its passage, and which is now held to be sacred and inviolable! This is the picture I present—which I prove to be true—and the like of which is not to be seen in the legislation, or even in the despotic decrees, of arbitrary monarchs, in any other country upon the face of the earth.

A few words upon another point, and I cease my remarks for the present.

I stated, in my opening observations, that the act of 1833 was incapable of any regular, uniform, fixed, or certain execution; that its provisions were too vague, loose, and unintelligible to admit of any uniform construction; and that it would receive as many different interpretations as there should be different authorities, or persons to execute it. This is what I said at the commencement of these remarks, and it was only a repetition of what I said seven years ago, when the act was on its passage. I then said that no Administration could execute that act; that no two human beings, or any two authorities, could construe it alike. I was answered by one of the authors of the measure, [Mr. CLAY,] that if the Administration would try to execute it in the spirit in which it was made, they would find no difficulty; they could do it easy enough. This is what I said seven years ago, and this the answer which I then received: and now let us see what the answer is which TIME gives to my remark. It is this (holding up a document.)

It is what is contained in this document, No. 49, of the House of Representatives—being a message from the President of the United States, covering reports from the Secretary of the Treasury and from the Comptroller of the Treasury, with opinions from the late Attorneys General of the United States, Messrs. Butler and Grundy, with letters from the collectors of the customs at all the principal Atlantic parts; all relating to the practical operation of this famous compromise act, and showing a great deal more about its operation than I have now either time or inclination to present. I limit myself to three articles out of the long list which it contains, namely, SILKS, LINENS, and WORSTEDS; and, passing over details, give the results in the annual losses to the revenue arising from diversity of decision by the Treasury officers and the judiciary in the construction of this act. And first of silks. The document, at page 44, states the annual ascertained loss during four years' operation of the act to be,

In 1835	$624 356	In 1837	463,090
1836	847,162	1838	428,237

Making in the four years, $2,362,845; and the Comptroller computes the annual prospective loss during the time the act may remain unaltered, at $800,000. So much for silks; now for linens. The same page, for the same four years, presents the annual loss on this article to be:

In 1835	$370,785	In 1837	303,241
1836	516,988	1838	226,375

Making the sum of $1,411,389 on this article for the four years; to which is to be added the estimated sum of $400,000, for the future annual losses, if the act remains unaltered.

On worsted goods, for the same time, and on page 45, the report exhibits the losses thus:

In 1835,	$409,329	1837,	$209,391
1836,	416,832	1838,	249,590

Making a total of ascertained loss on this head, in the brief space of four years, amount to the sum of $1,285,142; with a computation of a prospective loss of $500,000 per annum, while the compromise act remains as it is. Such are the results on three articles of unmixed fabricks; the mixed ones, and where the mixture is such as to make it impossible to tell to what classifiation of goods the article belongs under the vague and general phrases of the act, the contrariety of construction among Treasury officers, attorneys general, collectors of the customs, judges on the bench, and juries in the box, becomes too great for me to undertake to state. The result is that the Treasury Department, and the Congress, have nearly ceased to have any control in fixing or collecting the custom-house revenue. That business is now transferred to the juries of the importing cities—that is to say, it is transferred to those who have to pay the revenue, and who uniformly decide in favor of the payers; and that amidst the triumphant shouts of the political party now called Whigs. Two millions per annum is guessed at as the loss of the Treasury from the diversity of opinions about the classification of these mixed fabrics. What is ready made clothing, and what not, is equally a subject of contradictory decision. Happy would it be for the Government if things stopped there—if these juries only decided upon the amount of revenue to be paid into the Treasury: but that is not the case; they decide upon the question of taking revenue out of it; and whoever chooses to sue a collector, to recover back what he has paid in, under an alleged overcharge of the collector, is pretty sure to succeed! I have seen but one case reported to the contrary. But I forbear—I stop. My motion is for leave to bring in a bill to amend some of these errors—to stop some of the mischiefs of this compromise act of 1833—that act, the evils of which it is my pride to have foreseen, and my boast to have denounced on the night of its passage through this chamber.

I now ask leave to bring in my bill, trusting that I have shown enough to entitle me to the favor.

After a few remarks from Mr. DAVIS, concurring in many of Mr. B's positions, but declining to enter at present into a discussion on the fishing bounties, leave was granted to introduce the bill, and it was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The CHAIR laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, for the use of the members, sixty copies of the Navy Register for the year 1840; which was read.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of Florida, praying for the passage of an act granting to the settlers of the public lands in the Territory of Florida, who were deprived of their settlements by decrees of the courts of the United States, the right of pre-emption to a like quantity of other public lands; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a petition of Abigail Rankin, praying remuneration for the Revolutionary services of her late husband; which was referred to the committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of James Minge Burton; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of Thomas P. Copes; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also, the memorial of the corporate authorities of St. Louis, praying reimbursement of moneys expended in improving the harbor, and a further appropriation for the same; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of Mr. Munson; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, certain documents in relation to the claim of J. T. V. Thompson and Andrew Gartin; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a remonstrance against the annexation of Texas to the Union; which was laid on the table.

Mr. B. also presented the memorial of a number of citizens of the United States, praying the imposition of a moderate duty on silks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, a memorial of a number of tobacco manufacturers and others, citizens of Philadelphia, praying an increase of duties on imported cigars; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Also, a memorial of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; the motion to receive which was, on motion by Mr. KING, laid on the table.

Also, a memorial, praying an alteration of the Constitution on the subject of slavery; the motion to receive which was laid on the table.

Also, a memorial remonstrating against the use of bloodhounds in the Florida war; which was laid on the table.

Mr. WRIGHT prescribed the petition of Phebe Warry; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ROANE presented the petition of John W. Thompson; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr TALLMADGE presented the memorial of a number of citizens of the State of New York, praying the passage of a bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the proceedings of a meeting of citizens of the city of New York in favor of a bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALL presented a petition of a number of citizens of the United States, praying an increase of the duties on foreign silks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HENDERSON presented the memorial of the Legislature of Mississippi, praying the erection of several fortifications on the southern coast of that State, and a survey and examination of the different harbors and sounds on the said coast; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STURGEON presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Pennsylvania for the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the memorial of a number of tobacco manufacturers of Philadelphia, praying an increase of the duties on imported cigars; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. YOUNG presented two petitions from citizens of the State of Illinois, praying the establishment of mail routes; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented the memorial of Edward S. Wright of Georgetown, D. C. praying to be released from liability on a bond given by A. B. Claxton and Co. for their faithful performance of their contract for printing the Biennial Register; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROBINSON presented the petition of a number of citizens of Illinois, praying the establishment of a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. ALLEN presented the petition of a number of citizens of Hamilton county, Ohio, praying that two terms of the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Ohio may be holden in each year, at the city of Cincinnati; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Captain Snodgrass's company of Alabama volunteers, reported the same without amendment.

The bill was then, on motion of Mr. B. considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Gregoire Sarpy, made a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, who were instructed to inquire into the subject, reported a resolution to authorize the transmission of certain documents free of postage; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill to establish and regulate the navy ration, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama submitted the following motion, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate, as early as practicable, the original quantity of public lands in each of the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri; how many acres have been sold in each of those States, and the amount of two per cent. fund which has accrued on the nett amount of said sales, up to the latest returns; and also the total quantity of public lands which remain unsold in said several States, and also the quantity of land sold and patented in each State.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to satisfy the claim of Lieut. Albert Miller Lea for money expended and services rendered in surveying the Southern boundary of the line of the Iowa Territory.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. LUMPKIN said he rose to perform what he conceived to be a duty imposed on him, which was to ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution fixing a day for the adjournment of Congress. This was the day to which, with some reluctance, he had consented that its consideration should be postponed, and every day's experience but the more firmly convinced him not only of the propriety of considering it, but of acting on it. He would not detain the Senate by further remark, as there was no necessity of argument to elucidate the proposition, and every Senator could judge for himself of its propriety or impropriety. He asked that the resolution might be read by the Secretary; which was done.

The resolution was in the following words:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives do adjourn their respective Houses sine die, on Monday, the 18th day of May next.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said, that having voted against this proposition, when it was last before the Senate, and would vote against it now, he wished to make a few remarks in explanation of his votes. He was as anxious as any other Senator for an early adjournment of Congress, and the moment he saw the public business in such a state of forwardness as would warrant him in doing so, he would be willing to fix a day on which the session should terminate. But we were sent here to transact the important business of the nation, and no consideration of personal, convenience would induce him to give a vote which might defeat important measures, because we had not sufficient time for their proper discussion. He intended to remain until the business of the country was done, and the very moment he saw a prospect of its termination, he he would vote to fix a day for adjournment.

Mr. WEBSTER said the mover of the resolution had his most cordial concurrence in the views which induced him to offer it, but he regretted that Monday had been named as the day for adjournment. He thought that Wednesday would be better, as then the last three days could with propriety be devoted to business. It seemed to be generally admitted that the Senate could get through its business by the day mentioned, and he could see no impropriety in their passing the resolution; and if the House thinks the time too short, it can amend the resolution. In his opinion the day fixed was sufficiently remote. We shall by that time have been nearly six months in session, which was longer than the legislative session of any nation in the world, with the exception, perhaps, of Great Britain.

Mr. NORVELL said he was decidedly in favor of fixing an early day for adjournment. The long sessions of Congress were always too long, and the short sessions generally too short. With a view to the correction of this evil, and to present a new motive for an earlier adjournment than usual of the first session of each Congress, he proposed a second resolution, providing that the next session of Congress should commence on the second Monday of November.

Mr. WEBSTER observed that this could only be done by law.

Mr. LUMPKIN would prefer a direct vote upon his joint resolution for an adjournment on the 18th of May.

Mr. NORVELL said that the suggestions thrown out induced him to withdraw his amendment, and to state that he should to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill for an earlier commencement of the next session of Congress, if the joint resolution for adjourning in May should pass.

Mr. GRUNDY said that he presumed every Senator present was animated by a desire to bring the session to a close as soon as it could be done with propriety; but it appeared to him that it would be acting somewhat precipitately to pass on the resolution at this time. In the course of a week or two they would be better enabled to judge of the time it would require to transact the public business, and they should measure this time by the quantity of business to be done, and not by their personal convenience or inconvenience. There were many subjects of importance yet to be discussed, and among them he would mention the bankrupt law. He had always been opposed to such a law, but there had been such a general expression of sentiment in favor of such a law at the present session, that he was disposed to give the measure his most careful consideration, and if convinced of its practical utility, he would vote for it. If gentlemen thought that this important subject and other measures could be discussed and acted upon within the time proposed, they were right in voting for the proposition to fix the day of adjournment, but for his own part he thought it would be more prudent to defer its consideration for the present.

Mr. WEBSTER thought there was ample time to discuss the bankrupt law, as he supposed it would not be complicated in its provisions. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee had informed the Senate that he would probably introduce the bill in the course of this week, and two or three weeks would be ample to discuss and act upon it.

Mr. WILLIAMS was altogether unwilling to vote for this proposition, in the situation in which his State was placed. It was known to the Senate and to the country that his State was invaded, and a portion of her territory was in the possession of the troops of a foreign power. The British Government have been informed that a persistance in this course will be deemed by this Government as inconsistent with the stipulations which were entered into by the Governors of Maine and New Brunswick. How long it would require for us to be informed of the result of this declaration, he did not know; but he thought that Congress should not adjourn without taking measures to settle this question definitively. If Congress adjourned, the inference would be that Great Britain was to keep possession of the disputed territory until Congress was again assembled. This he was opposed to, and he thought it would not be submitted to by the people of his State. A call had been recently made on the President for information on a subject which had some bearing on this matter: he alluded to the warlike preporations of Great Britain on the North and Northwestern frontier; and until that was answered, he thought it would be imprudent to act on this question of adjournment. He would therefore move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution to this day two weeks.

Mr. SEVIER said, if they remained here until the Maine boundary question was settled, they would probably be in session until the 4th of March next. He thought himself that it was full time this question was settled; but he had no expectation that it would be settled at an early day. If the Senator intends to force this matter to a decision, let him bring in a bill declaring war against Great Britain, if she will not relinquish her pretensions, and it shall have my most favorable consideration. He thought these repeated postponements of this resolution, and thus consuming a day in every week in its discussion, was a fruitless and unprofitable course; and he would vote against any further postponement.

Mr. WILLIAMS said he was not, at this time, prepared to act on the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas, to bring in a bill declaring war against Great Britain. He was willing to wait until we had received an answer to the inquiries made of the President in relation to warlike preparations on our side of the line. He thought that Congress should then take it into its own hands to protect the rights of the nation. The question of right had been again and again settled, and he trusted that the day was not distant when the Territory Maine would be delivered from the presence of the troops of a foreign power.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said that, when this proposition was before the Senate the other day, he was opposed to any delay in acting on it; but he confessed that the remarks of some of his friends, and particularly of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] had occasioned some change in his sentiments. He was anxious that the Senate should adjourn at the earliest day the state of the public business would permit; but thought that, at present, it would be improper to name a day for that purpose. It was probable that, in the course of a fortnight, events might occur which would enable them to act more understandingly, and he would therefore vote in favor of its postponement.

Mr. HUBBARD said that when this motion was up before, he had moved its postponement, as he deemed that its only effect would be to embarrass the proceedings of the other House. There were a great many bills both of a public and private character which had passed this body, but were yet unacted on in the House, and he thought a movement of this kind would be at least premature, if not injurious. He was as desirous as any Senator for an early adjournment, but he would not consent to it at the risk of sacrificing the business of the nation, and the interests of the numerous individuals who had just claims upon the Government.

Mr. H. referred to the introduction of a similar proposition in the session of 1837-8, when it was at first proposed to adjourn in April, but which the House disagreed to. In June the House passed a resolution to adjourn on the 9th of July, which the Senate promptly acceded to. He thought that nothing would be gained by a movement of this kind at this early day.

Mr. WALL would have preferred that the Senator from Maine had moved an indefinite postponement of the resolution. He had had but one opinion of it since its introduction, and that was, that it was altogether a premature movement. As yet we have received but three or four bills from the other branch of Congress, while nearly all the great measures in which the country were interested were as yet scarcely touched in that branch. And it is under this state of circumstances that the Senator from Georgia attempts to guess the amount of time it will require for Congress to get through its business, and be prepared to adjourn. Though he was convinced that the Senator was actuated by the most patriotic motives in adopting this course, and thought that the public business would be accelerated, he [Mr. W.] was convinced that it would produce no such result. Every Senator was anxious to adjourn as early as could be done, consistent with [illegible] sense of duty: he would say that he subjected himself to great sacrifices by remaining here; but were all the great measures of the country, and the great mass of private business which we have upon our calendar, to perish, for want of sufficient time to mature them? If this resolution was passed, it could only be looked upon as an attempt to goad the other House into action; and, viewed in this light, it would occasion more injury than benefit

Mr. NORVELL said that none of the arguments advanced had induced any change of his opinion in favor of an early adjournment. If the two Houses fixed on the 18th of May as the day for adjournment, our proceedings would be governed by a view to that precise time; and we should act upon the business of the country, which was before us. As it was, we were wasting our time in making partisan speeches, to the neglect of that business. In relation to the Maine boundary question, if there were any hope of its termination, whether favorably or unfavorably, during the year, he would, with the Senator from Arkansas, agree to sit here till March next, for the purpose of accomplishing that object. But, sir, we see no indication of any measures to meet any emergency which may arise out of the protracted negotiations on that subject. Have we any propositions for augmenting our army? Have we any proposition to equip and man a greater number of vessels for the naval service? Has any thing been proposed with a view to any serious event which may grow out of the boundary question? Sir, if any change should take place in our foreign relations, requiring the adoption of fresh measures of preparation for the worst contingencies that can happen between nations, before the day designated in the joint resolution for adjournment, it is to be presumed, it cannot be doubted, that Congress would rescind that resolution.

Mr. LUMPKIN said, that reluctant as he generally was to consume the time of the Senate, by occupying the floor in debate, he felt himself called upon, on the present occasion, to defend himself, and the measure which he had introduced. More particularly did this duty devolve on him, because it was assailed by so many of the friends with whom he generally acted in the Senate. Mr. L. said another week's consideration had but the more confirmed the opinion which he had expressed on the first introduction of the resolution. He believed much good and no evil would result from the Senate fixing on a definite day for the adjournment of the present session of Congress. After a careful examination and consideration of the business necessary to be done at the present session of Congress, it will be found that the time proposed is ample for the proper transaction of all the necessary business of legislation. Sir, (said Mr. L.) I do not propose to leave or neglect the public business and go home, as some gentlemen seem to suppose. No, sir, I propose to go to work, and do the public business in a reasonable time, and then go home. The honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. WALL,] considers my proposition, as being based on a guess. He seems not to favor the idea of even venturing to guess how long this session of Congress ought to remain in session. He considers this guessing rather a hazardous business, calculated to endanger the public interest. Now, sir, (said Mr. L.) I will admit that no mathematician can demonstrate, to an hour or a day, how long the present Congress ought to remain in session in order to a faithful discharge of our legislative duties. But, sir, it is admitted, I believe, by every gentleman who has yet spoken, that the time which is proposed is ample for the Senate to discharge all its legislative duties, and I will venture to guess that none will controvert that opinion. But, said Mr. L. let me inform that honorable Senator that my proposition is not based upon a guess, as he seems to suppose. No, sir; before I introduced the proposition, with great care and labor I investigated the subject. First, I considered the measures to which the attention of Congress had been invited by the Executive branch of the Government; and then, sir, I carefully examined all your dockets to see what had been brought to the consideration of Congress by all its members in both branches. The result of this investigation left the conviction on my mind that the public interest required the closing of this session on or before the time proposed. In this calculation, too, I have allowed for one-half of our time to be spent in useless debate—debate upon subjects which are not, and cannot be, subjects of legitimate legislation. But, sir, while it is admitted that the time proposed is more than sufficient for the discharge of the business of the Senate, every gentleman opposed to this proposition reminds us that nothing is yet done in the other end of the Capitol, and that a longer time will be necessary to enable the House of Representatives to discharge its share of legislative duties. Sir, this may be true, or it may not. It is not for me—it is not for the Senate to determine this question. Of this matter the House will judge for itself. What I propose, sir, is, that we now inform the House that we shall be ready to close this session of Congress on the 18th of May next, and that we proceed to discharge the obligation we shall thereby place ourselves under, by proceeding to the faithful discharge of our own duties. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] has very justly remarked that if the House of Representatives shall come to the conclusion that the time which we propose for closing the present session of Congress, is too limited for a faithful discharge of the business of that House, they may propose an amendment—an extension of the time to a more distant day. This course, sir, would be placing the responsibility of an extended, protracted session of Congress, where it should be placed. Let us discharge our own duty, and leave to others their own responsibility.

The honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] and other Senators, are opposed to fixing a day of adjournment, in anticipation of the most important legislative duties which may hereafter devolve on Congress, growing out of our relations with Great Britain, on the subject of the Eastern boundary controversy. In this case, sir, might we not say with propriety, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof?" Is it wise, is it expedient, for Congress to make calculations and arrangements for an unnecessarily long and protracted session, in anticipation of new subjects of legislation—cases which may or may not arise? Sir, if we act upon such principles as these, the sessions of Congress will be perpetual; Congress will become an indissoluble body, except when the people invite us home, for the purpose of supplying our places with others. It is known to every one, who has been attentive to the proceedings of Congress, that the longer the session is extended, the more unfinished business is left at the close. If Congress were a perpetual body, always in session, to the end of time, the necessity of unfinished business would, without doubt, continue to increase.

Mr. President, the extraordinary length of the sessions of Congress is an admitted evil; one which none will have the boldness to deny. It has become a burden upon your Treasury. Reform is called for. Duty, economy demands it—the value of time demands it. Why, then, all this reluctance which we see manifested, to aid in the humble effort which has been attempted? Why has this proposition been called a deceptive one? Why is it calculated to deceive the people? Why is it considered hopeless to propose this reform? Sir, the indications around me exhibit the true cause, and prove that gentlemen have it in their power to fulfil their own predictions. My attempt may fail for want of support, but I shall have deceived no one. I have discharged my duty. Good has resulted, and will hereafter result, from this effort made to produce reform.

The question was then taken on postponing the resolution until Monday, the 30th day of March, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 22, noes 18.

The Senate then went into Executive session, and afterwards Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 16, 1840.

The CHAIR announced that he had been informed that the Representatives elect from New Jersey were present, and would be qualified.

Mr. JENIFER offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the execution of the resolution of this House of the 10th of March, directing the Speaker to qualify as members of this House, Philemon Dickerson, Peter D. Vroom, Daniel B. Ryall, Wm. R. Cooper, and Joseph Kille, be postponed until the 2d Monday in April next, to afford the other five claimants from the State of New Jersey an opportunity of presenting their evidence, as directed to be taken by the Committee of Elections.

Mr. WELLER of Ohio inquired whether the resolution was in order.

The CHAIR replied in the negative.

Mr. JENIFER said that, if that was the decision of the CHAIR, he should acquiesce, without any motion in the case.

Mr. PROFFIT inquired of the CHAIR whether he had not the right to call on the gentlemen for their credentials.

The SPEAKER replied, that the House had already passed a resolution that these gentlemen were entitled to their seats, and directing the Speaker to qualify them, and any motion on the subject would be out of order.

The following gentlemen were then qualified as Representatives from the State of New Jersey, viz.—WM. R. COOPER, PHILEMON DICKERSON, JOSEPH KILLE and DANIEL B. RYALL.

CHINA AND THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CUSHING said: I beg leave to put a question to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. PICKENS] in regard to a matter concerning which misapprehension exists abroad, and which, though it touches individually myself and a colleague of mine now absent on a sick bed, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] I should not have troubled the House with, if it were not of great public importance to the welfare and reputation of the United States.

No objection being made, Mr. CUSHING proceeded to say: I proposed a resolution, early in the session, calling on the Executive for information as to our relations with China, which resolution, being afterwards submitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, was by them reported to the House, and adopted; and to which the Executive has since responded, in a Message now in the possession of the House. My colleague [Mr. LAWRENCE] also presented a memorial from citizens of the United States in China, relative to the same matter. These papers are now under consideration in the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Meanwhile, I am somewhat disturbed to learn, through the intelligence brought by the Great Western, that these movements here are construed in England as indicating a disposition on the part of the American Government "to join heart and hand"—as the expression is in a paragraph of an English ministerial journal now before me—"to join heart and hand with the British Government, and endeavor to obtain commercial treaties from the authorities in China." Now, so far as regards myself, I wish to say that this is a great misconception, if it be not a wilful perversion, of what is contemplated here. I have, it is true, thought that the present contingency,—when the Americans at Canton, and they almost or quite alone, have manifested a proper respect for the laws and public rights of the Chinese empire, in honorable contrast with the outrageous misconduct of the English there—and when the Chinese Government, grateful for the upright deportment of the Americans, has manifested the best possible feeling towards them—I have thought that these circumstances afforded a favorable opportunity to endeavor to put the American trade with China on a just and stable footing for the future. But, God forbid that I should entertain the idea of co-operating with the British Government in the purpose—if purpose it have—of upholding the base cupidity and violence, and high handed infraction of all law, human and divine, which have characterized the operations of the British, individually and collectively, in the seas of China. I disavow all sympathy with those operations. I denounce them most emphatically. And, though it is not competent for me to speak now of what has been done or is intended in the Committee on Foreign Affairs relative to this, yet thus much I may say, that, in that committee, and among all its members, I am confident there is but one spirit—and that is, to guard the interests and to maintain the honor of the United States. It is due to the Executive, also, that I should say that I have no reason to believe or suspect that the President or his Cabinet entertains any but the most proper views on this subject. At the same time, to close the door at once against all misunderstanding, and set the whole matter in a clear light, in order that the Chinese Government need not be misled into supposing that, while the Americans in Canton profess to act in good faith, and enjoy the benefits of it, any different purpose is entertained here, I put this question to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs—whether he himself, or, so far as he knows, the Executive of the United States, has any idea of making common cause with Great Britain in reference to the recent events in China?

Mr. PICKENS, in reply, said that, in reference to himself, it was very far from being the fact that he was disposed to make common cause with England in her designs in China—for the very first moment the subject was referred to the committee, and laid before them, that very point was made by himself, and he objected expressly to our appearing before the world, (as might be inferred from the expression in the memorial) of acting in concert with the British Government in regard to this matter. So far as the Executive was concerned, he had no authority for speaking; but he was induced to believe that no such fact of intended concert with Great Britain, as the gentleman directly referred to, existed. He had no intention directly or indirectly to aid in forcing on the Chinese the odious traffic in opium. He (Mr. P.) believed that if we could prevail on China to abandon her policy of non intercourse with the world if we could prevail on her to enter into any arrangement that might have for its basis commercial relations which would place us on an equal footing with other powers, it would be all that was necessary. But of this he had little hopes, for it was known that China, from time immemorial, had been opposed to all treaties. Our only object (said Mr. P.) is to place our commerce with China on an equal footing with that of other nations, and to see that no advantage be taken of us.

Surely England does not occupy a position at present to command any sympathy or co-operation from us. He would forbear to touch upon those points that are now at issue between us, which may, in the progress of events, become of the deepest importance. It is not our policy to appear to act under her cover and co-operation. We will act upon our separate and independent interests, and our own views of policy.

Mr. CUSHING then said: I thank the House for its indulgence, and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who has answered my question so satisfactorily; and I trust the idea will no longer be entertained in England, if she chooses to persevere in the attempt to coerce the Chinese by force of arms to submit to be poisoned with opium by whole provinces, that she is to receive aid or countenance from the United States in that nefarious enterprise.

The CHAIR announced that the question first in order was the motion of Mr. CASEY to refer the memorial of the National Road Convention, held at Terre Haute, Indiana, to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill making a reasonable appropriation for the continuation of the National road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, for the year 1840, to be expended under the direction of the War Department; said appropriation to be subject to all the restrictions and conditions of former appropriations on said road."

The substitute of Mr. [PICKENS for said instructions, as follows:

"And that the memorial be committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to consider the expediency of reporting a bill in favor of the measure."

And Mr. MARVIN's amendment to the original proposition, and substitute for Mr. PICKENS's amendment, as follows:

"And that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report bills in accordance with the estimates contained in the reports from the Chief Engineer, and the Chief of the Topographical Engineers, to the Secretary of War, and communicated to Congress by the President, making appropriations for the year 1840, for the continuation of the construction or improvements of harbors and roads, and the navigation of rivers, for which appropriations have been heretofore made."

The SPEAKER said, when the subject was last up, the question immediately pending was the motion for the previous question, which had not been seconded. The House had ordered a call, upon which it adjourned. If there was no objection, the call would be dispensed with.

Several gentlemen persisted in having the call, which was proceeded in till 192 members had answered to their names; when,

On motion of Mr. RAMSAY, all further proceedings in the same was dispensed with.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered; which main question was, Shall the substitution of Mr. MARVIN for the proposition of Mr. PICKENS be adopted?

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON here offered an amendment to the substitute of Mr. MARVIN, proposing an appropriation for the improvement of the Monocacy river, in Maryland; which was ruled out of order, and which Mr. M. refused to accept as a modification.

The question was then taken on Mr. MARVIN's substitute, and decided in the negative—yeas 80, nays 112.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Barnard, Beatty, Biddle, Bond, Brewster, Brockway, W. O. The question then recurring on the substitute of Mr. PICKENS,

Mr. CASEY said, as it would be decisive of the question, he demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; when

Mr. PICKENS, in view of the vote given, withdrew his substitute.

The question then recurred on the original proposition [Mr. CASEY's;] upon which the yeas and nays were ordered, and were—yeas 88, nays 109, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, John W. Allen,

So the House refused to refer, with instructions.

The memorial alone was then referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, without instructions.

Mr. RARIDEN gave notice that he should, at an early day, ask leave to introduce a bill making appropriations to continue the Cumberland Road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Mr. BARNARD gave notice that he would, at an early day, ask leave to introduce a bill making an appropriation for the continuance of the improvements in the Hudson river.

Mr. BLACK, from the Select Committee on Printing, by universal consent reported a resolution extending the time for that committee to report, to the 24th of March; which was read and agreed to.

Mr. WISE, by permission, presented a memorial from Charles Fenderick, proposing to execute the printing of maps at a less rate than at present done; which was referred to the Select Committee on Printing.

Petitions being in order to-day,

The SPEAKER called the roll for that purpose, commencing with the Territory of Iowa; when

Mr. W. W. CHAPMAN, in accordance with previous notice given, and by permission, introduced a bill to authorize the President of the United States to cause certain mineral lands to be sold; which was twice read, and committed to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. C. also gave notice that he would, at the proper time, ask leave to introduce a bill to establish certain post routes in Iowa, and for the discontinuance of others.

Also, a memorial for pre-emption rights to actual settlers on the public lands.]

By Messrs. BROWN and THOMPSON, of Mississippi.

By Messrs. RARIDEN, CARR, SMITH, DAVIS, and WICK, of Indiana.

[Mr. CARR presented a joint resolution from the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, requesting their Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their influence to procure an act of Congress to grant to Peter Houston such portion of the refuse lands lying east of Indianapolis State road, leading from Indianapolis to Bloomington, on the east side of Beanblossom, in the county of Monroe, in said State, which may be unentered, and has been in market for twenty years, as will be a reasonable compensation for his services in the Revolutionary war; which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. Also, a joint resolution from the General Assembly of Indiana, on the subject of a mail route, therein named; which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Also, a joint resolution from the General Assembly of Indiana, soliciting Congress for a grant of two townships of land, for the construction and support of an asylum for the education of deaf mutes and blind persons; which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. Also, the petition of Jacob Haas, praying Congress to pass an act to confirm to him certain lands, in said petition described: referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.]

Mr. CARR said he had received a memorial from a committee, composed of highly respectable individuals, the organ of a meeting of the citizens of the Town of Jeffersonville, memorializing Congress on a subject in which the West, and he believed he might say the whole West, felt a deep interest. It was to increase the facilities of navigation at the Falls of the Ohio; and to do this, the best mode, in the opinion of the memorialists, would be to construct a canal around the falls on the Indiana side, sufficiently large to pass the largest class of steamboats on the Western waters. It was well known that the facility of navigation at that point, now, is such that the larger class of steamboats have been detained above the falls for nearly a year at a time, and also large boats belonging above the falls have been detained as long below the falls; this detention is the cause of great loss and injury, not only to the owners of these boats, but to the commerce of the country. The memorialists do not oppose the purchase of the individual stock in the Louisville and Portland canal by the Government, yet while they acquiesce in that measure, they strongly and very forcibly urge the propriety, utility, and, he might add, the absolute necessity, of constructing a canal around the falls of the Ohio, on the Indiana shore; and the ground assumed is the incapacity of the present canal to afford facilities which the increased and increasing commerce of the country seems to demand; and taking in consideration the great and growing increase of the trade and commerce of the whole West, the time is near at hand when the canal, however large, will not be sufficient to do all the business which will require to be done, without great delay, and much loss and injury.

To prove this, Mr. C. said it was only necessary to state a fact. The number of boats which passed through the canal in 1839, is estimated at between twenty and twenty-five hundred, with a tonnage amounting to 300,000; that the number of boats which passed in the year 1831, was a little upwards of eight hundred, with a tonnage of 76,323. Thus it will be seen that the increase of boats in 1839, is nearly equal to 200 per cent. and in the tonnage more than 200 per cent. Then calculating on an equal increase of the trade and commerce for many years to come, with that of the few years past, and it will be but a very few yeas until there will be more than six thousand boats pass the falls of the Ohio in one year, ascending and descending.

Mr. C. said this was a matter of great importance to the Western people, that it was a subject in which twelve of the States of this Union were directly interested, and that it was a subject which must and would, he had no doubt, and that, too, at no distant day, be respectfully considered by Congress. From the importance of the subject, he would most respectfully ask that the memorial be printed: he therefore moved that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and that it be printed, and it was so ordered.

[Mr. DAVIS of Indiana, presented the petition of John Johnson, for a pension, accompanied by his discharge. The petition of Hannah Kuble, for payment of a certain amount of continental money in her possession. A joint resolution of the Legislature of Indiana, asking for public lands for a Deaf and Dumb Asylum. A petition for a mail route from Carlisle to Springville, Indiana. A petition for a change in a mail route from Terre Haute to Springville, Indiana.]

[Mr. LEET of Pennsylvania presented the petition of Alexander Hill, of Washington county, Pennsylvania, praying for a pension, with an accompanying document: referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Also, the petition of sundry citizens of Washington county, Pennsylvania, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Steubenville, Ohio, by the way of Elderville, and Cross Creeek Village, to Washington, Pennsylvania: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Also, two several petitions of sundry inhabitants of Jefferson county, Ohio, and of Ohio county and Brooke county, Virginia, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Steubenville, Ohio, via Eldersville and Cross Creek Village, to Washington, Pennsylvania: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Raods. Also, three several petitions signed by a large number of citizens of Pennsylvania and Virginia, praying for the passage of a law establishing a direct mail route from Pittsburgh, in Pennsylvania, to Morgantown, in Va.: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Also, presented the petition of sundry inhabitants of Washington county, Pennsylvania, praying for the establishment of a cross mail route from Canonsburgh, in said county, via Thompsonville, Bowerhill, Fenlyville, and Muntown, to the post office McCullough's store, on the Washington and Bedford turnpike road.

Mr. L. said, in presenting the memorial, he would take occasion to remark that Canonsburgh, one of the points mentioned in the petition, is the site of a very respectable and flourishing literary institution, known by the name of the Jefferson college, and that the proposed mail route will also connect with the Bedford turnpike road, which leads to Washington, the seat of the Washington college, a highly respectable and useful institution: referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.]

Mr. LEET said he had in his hand two memorials, signed by citizens of Washington county, Pennsylvania, and who reside principally in a section of that county, which borders on the Northwestern part of Virginia, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas to the United States. Mr. L. remarked he did not suppose the memorials came within the rule of the House, relating to Abolition petitions. The petition was read, and Mr. L. moved to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; but, on motion of Mr. PETRIKIN, it was laid on the table.

[Mr. J. DAVIS presented the petition of Hannah Duffield of Philadelphia county, Pennsylvania, widow of Jacob Duffield, a soldier of the late war, who died in the service of the United States, praying Congress to grant her a pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions. [Mr. MARCHAND presented a petition for a mail route from Indiana, Indiana county, by the way of Mechanicsburgh and Armagh, to Johnstown, in the county of Cambria, Pennsylvania.]

By Mr. DICKERSON of New Jersey.

By Messrs. MONTANYA, FLOYD, MITCHELL, CLARK, LEONARD, VANDERPOEL, HAND, PRENTISS, DANA, KEMPSHALL, BREWSTER, EARL, and BARNARD, of New York:

[Mr. EARL presented the petition of Daniel Pratt, a soldier of the late war with Great Britain, asking Congress to grant him a pension: referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The petition of John Bowman and Thomas Ney, heirs at law of certain soldiers of the late war with Great Britain, stating that they have three land warrants from the War Department, and asking Congress to permit them to locate the same quantity of land on any lands of the Government subject to private entry: referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. Also, the petition of Ira Fancher, a musician in the late war with Great Britain, asking Congress to grant him a pension: referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.]

[Mr. PRENTISS of New York presented the petition of Lewis Hyott, and others, of the town of Otsego, Otsego county, New York, praying that Samuel Fisk, in consideration of Revolutionary services, may be placed on the pension roll.]

[Mr. LEONARD presented the petition of Richard Reynolds, of New York, an invalid soldier of the late war, praying for a pension: referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Also, the petition of Alexander Thompson, of New York, a Revolutionary soldier, praying to be inscribed on the pension roll: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.]

Mr. MITCHELL presented certain joint resolutions from the Legislature of New York, against the passage of the Sub-Treasury bill.

These resolutions, Mr. M. said, were the voice of the Empire State of New York; and he moved that they be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. VANDERPOEL gave notice of his intention to say a few words on these resolutions.

So they were ordered to lie over.

Mr. BARNARD presented similar resolutions, and moved their commitment to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. [Ordered to lie over.]

Mr. BARNARD presented a petition praying that the resolution of the 28th of January in relation to Abolition petitions be rescinded.

Mr. WILLIAM COST JOHNSON moved to lay it on the table.

Several motions for calls of the House and adjournment were made and withdrawn; when the petition was ordered to lie over.

Mr. BARNARD presented a petition against the admission of Florida into the Union until slavery was abolished within her limits, and moved its reference to the Committee on the Territories.

The SPEAKER decided that, under the resolution adopted by the House, the petition could not be received.

Mr. ADAMS appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

Motions for calls of the House and adjournment were again renewed and withdrawn; when

Mr. BARNARD said that, in order not to obstruct the presentation of petitions, he would, for the present, withdraw this petition.

So the petition was withdrawn. But the SPEAKER having decided that the appeal remained as an independent question, and was to be decided at this time, and Mr. ADAMS having declined to withdraw it—

A motion to adjourn (it being new 5 o'clock) was again made, and was decided, by yeas 31, nays 81, in the negative.

So the House refused to adjourn. But there was no quorum voting.

Mr. BARNARD submitted to the SPEAKER that the appeal giving rise to debate, must lie over.

The SPEAKER having otherwise decided,

Mr. ADAMS proposed a compromise: That the House should pass a resolution like that adopted at the close of the session, that every member having petitions that would not give rise to debate, should send them to the table, where they might be entered and referred.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected to any motion.

Mr. ADAMS said, that being the case, he would move an adjournment.

And the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, March 17, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a petition of the administrator of John Piper, deceased, praying compensation for Revolutionary services; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. LINN presented a memorial of a number of citizens of St. Louis, praying the erection of a custom-house at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Philadelphia, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALL presented the memorial of a number of citizens of the United States, praying an increase of the duties on foreign silks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Bangor, in the State of Maine, praying the passage of a bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CUTHBERT presented the memorial of a number of citizens of the State of New York, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the petition of Enoch Evans, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to whom was referred the bill to authorize the purchase of stock for the United States, in the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, reported it with an amendment, and also submitted a special report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed, and one thousand additional copies were ordered to be printed.

Mr. STURGEON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the petition of Eliza Causin, reported a bill for her relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. S. from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Captain William Williams; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of Zachariah and Robert W. Williams, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading, and the report ordered to be printed.

Mr. H. also from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Clements, Bryan and Company; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MOUTON, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill confirming the claim of John Baptiste Lacompte to a tract of land in Louisiana; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. RUGGLES, it was ordered that the bill to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole, or in part, by steam, be made the special order of the day for Monday the 23d inst.

Mr. NORVELL submitted the following motion, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision to compensate such of the inhabitants of Michigan for losses of property taken or destroyed by the enemy in the late war with Great Britain as have not received such compensation; and that the memorial of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Michigan on the subject, presented to the Senate on the 14th March, 1834, be taken from the files and referred to said committee.

Mr. WALL submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to appoint a board consisting of navy and marine officers, to witness an exhibition of the improved boarding pistols and rifles invented by Samuel Colt, and report the results in detail for the information of Congress; together with their opinion of the advantages to be derived from the adoption of the same for the services of boarders and marines.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

On motion of Mr. YOUNG the, Senate resumed the consideration of the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama moved that its further consideration be postponed until Monday next; which was disagreed to—ayes 12, nays 22.

Mr. NORVELL proposed a new section to the bill, making appropriations for the further prosecution of the improvement of all the roads, rivers, and harbors, which have been heretofore commenced by the General Government.

Mr. N. said that the proposed amendment embraced appropriations for works already begun, and that these appropriations were founded upon estimates communicated to Congress, in the early part of this session, by the War Department. He had omitted two items for light houses, because they properly belonged to another bill, which, it was probable, would, in a short time, be reported to the Senate by the Committee on Commerce, of which he had the honor to be a member. He was fully aware that the Treasury was in an exhausted condition; and he would, under these circumstances, however reluctantly, consent to defer at least some of those appropriations, if the Cumberland road bill were not pressed upon us. But if we had to borrow five millions of dollars, or to authorize the issue of that sum in Treasury notes, to enable us to go on with that expensive work, and to replenish the exchequer for other purposes, he thought that it would be equally right and proper to borrow or issue ten millions, instead of five, to enable us to improve the harbors, rivers and roads in other States, for the completion of which he considered the faith of the Government more evidently pledged than for that of the Cumberland road. The former works were commenced, and to be continued out of the general funds in the Treasury. The Cumberland road was to be made out of a special fund, which had been run out long since. He desired that the amendment might be printed, in order that the Senate should have an opportunity to examine it, and to see that it conformed to official estimates made by the topographical and military bureaus. He appealed to the Senators from Indiana and Illinois to permit this course to be taken, and to allow the further consideration of the bill to be postponed until to-morrow.

After some remarks from Mr. TAPPAN, Mr. YOUNG, and Mr. SMITH of Indiana, in opposition to the motion for postponement,

Mr. NORVELL regretted that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SMITH] would not concur in the motion to postpone for a single day, and to print the amendment. The delay could not materially retard the progress of the bill, and would afford the Senate an opportunity to give the whole subject a more mature consideration. He had not anticipated that the bill would come up at this moment, and was not prepared to present the brief views which he had intended to take of the bill and the amendment. The Senator from Indiana had pledged himself to vote for the appropriations embraced in the amendment, if brought up in a separate bill. But did not the Senator perceive, did he not know, that these appropriations, admitted by him to be so important to Western interests, would fail, if detached from those proposed for the Cumberland road? It would be vain for us to indulge in the delusion, or to affect to believe, that the separation of the propositions, so naturally connected, could secure the success of both: it might be fatal to that of either. The estimate for the Cumberland road had come to us in the same report, under the same head, in the same table, with the estimates for the other roads, rivers, and harbors, for the completion of which the amendment which he had submitted proposed to make appropriations. Why, then, should the Senate select a single object, detach it from the others of kindred nature, and make it the favored and favorite work for Government patronage? Was this just? was it equal? was it national? How could such a course as this be reconciled with that principle of compromise, of equal and exact justice to all the States, upon which the Federal Constitution was based? If, as alleged by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. YOUNG,] the Cumberland road appropriations had always been kept separate and distinct from others, of which he entertained great doubt, the practice had been improper and unjust, and should be arrested. However, without wishing to embarrass the bill by unnecessary delay, he moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Thursday next, and to print the amendment.

The question was then taken and decided in the affirmative—ayes 20, noes 14.

So the further consideration of the bill was postponed until Thursday next, and the bill and amendment were ordered to be printed.

The bill to provide for the payment of damages sustained by individuals by the wars with Indian tribes since 1830, was taken up, and, after being debated by Messrs. CLAY of Alabama, HUBBARD, and GRUNDY, and several amendments adopted, it was ordered to be printed.

The bill more effectually to secure public money in the hands of officers and agents of the Government, and to punish public defaulters, was taken up, and, after several amendment were adopted, it was informally passed over, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business.

After which, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill granting a pension to Lemuel White; but before taking a question thereon, Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, March 17, 1840.

Mr. TILLINGHAST asked permission of the House to present certain resolutions of the Legislature of Rhode Island in relation to the public lands, which he had not been afforded an opportunity to present. He merely wished to refer them to the Committee of the Whole

Mr. HUBBARD of Alabama objected; when

Mr. TILLINGHAST moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to present the resolutions.

Mr. FILLMORE asked the gentleman from Rhode Island so to modify his motion as to have the rules suspended for the reception of petitions generally.

Mr. TILLINGHAST modified his motion accordingly.

Mr. J. W. JONES demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules; which were ordered, and were—yeas 91, nays 82.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. REED, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, by permission, reported to the House

A bill to regulate the pay and emoluments of pursers in the navy; and which were read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

A bill to regulate the navy rations;

The CHAIR announced that the business first in order was the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections by Mr. CAMPBELL, their chairman, proposing to print all the testimony connected with the New Jersey contested election; and the amendment of Mr. R. GARLAND of Louisiana, to print other testimony referred to that committee, subsequent to its report.

Mr. JENIFER, who was still entitled to the floor on the above question, spoke in continuation of his remarks on Saturday last, and commented on the course of the committee with much severity. He was interrupted frequently by Mr. CAMPBELL, chairman, and Mr. MEDILL, a member of the Committee of Elections, who corrected him in many of his statements, and protested against many of his conclusions.

Mr. BROWN of Tennessee, another member of the committee, followed in reply to Mr. JENIFER, and examined the resolutions instructing the committee, and defined its duties under the same, showing that, when the facts upon which the report was based shall be published, they will be a perfect justification of its course; and will satisfy the House and the world that their conduct has been in accordance with right, and with truth and justice. He further maintained that, from the admission of the parties themselves before the committee, in their written statements on record, and now proposed to be printed the committee were prepared to report in a short time after an examination of the same, and that it could have come to no other conclusion, whatever the delay, than that the Democratic claimants were entitled to hold seats under the resolution adopted by the House.

The morning hour expired before Mr. B. concluded his able defence of the committee. It will be published hereafter in full.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES,

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. DAWSON in the chair, and took up

THE TREASURY NOTE BILL.

Mr. CUSHING, who was still entitled to the floor on this bill, resumed his remarks in a general review of the policy of the past and present Administrations, which he argued had a blighting effect upon the commerce of the country. He examined the question of currency in its most extensive range, showing how far the circulating medium operated to increase and lessen the value of the products of labor, denying that the reduction of such value would be a proper policy, under existing circumstances, or would be beneficial to the nation, with reference to its intercourse with foreign nations. He went into a long argument to shew that specie was not the representative of value, or of property, but could be considered in no other light than as constituting a part of the property of the country, and was as much a merchantable commodity as any other article, and fluctuated in value in proportion as the demand was to the supply. He believed that a reduction of the currency, and a consequent reduction in labor, and the product of labor, would deprive the laboring classes of the luxuries imported from foreign countries, such as silks, coffee, teas, etc. on the ground that those articles would maintain their present prices throughout the world, without regard to the circulating medium of this country—whether it be great or small.

Mr. C. was opposed to an enlargement of the powers of the General Government, and that the only security for the interests of the States and the liberties of the people, was by the proper maintenance of the sovereignty of the States. He was in favor of a change of the tenure of the office of President. He desired no advantage to the productive interests of the East, at the expense of the interests of the South and the West, but was in favor of such legislative action as would best protect every interest of the nation; and that he should always look to the true interests of the country, without regard to party.

Mr. C. dwelt at some length on the causes of the increase in the expenditures during the past and present Administrations, contending that such increase was not chargeable to the Opposition; and in proof of that fact said that the policy of the late Administration party was to exhaust the surplus revenues, by heavy appropriations to national objects; and that of the party with which he acted was to limit them, by proper restrictions, for the purpose of increasing the amount for distribution among the States. He said he did not complain of those large appropriations, for he had voted for the most of them himself, and believed them necessary. They were also justified by the organ of the Administration in that House at the time. Mr. C. having concluded his remarks, (which will be published hereafter,)

Mr. KING obtained the floor, and, on his motion, the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL,

The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
17th March, 1840.

GENTLEMEN: My attention has been called to your paper of the 5th inst. I perceive in a part of Mr. BYNUM'S speech, upon the subject of Abolition, the following sentence, which does me gross injustice, no doubt unintentional, as I am informed it is a misprint. The sentence is in the following words: "Sir I am ready to admit I am, unlike the honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. BANKS,] who declared the other day that he did not believe that there were twenty Abolitionists on this floor, although it is a very different sentiment from what has heretofore fallen from that wing of the party." You will make the correction in both of your papers. I presume the member alluded to is a colleague of mine.

Yours, respectfully,
LINN BANKS.

Messrs BLAIR and RIVES.

IN SENATE,
WEDNESDAY, March 18, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, in relation to the imports and exports of gold and silver coin and bullion; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented the memorial of Bliss and Creighton, chronometer manufacturers, of the city of New York, praying the adoption of measures for the encouragement of the manufacture of chronometers in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Wisconsin, praying a donation of public land, to be applied to the establishment of manual labor schools in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. H. also presented the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Wisconsin, praying a donation of public land for the improvement of the navigation of the Neena, Wisconsin, Rock, Peekatonic, Platte, and Four Lake Rivers; and also an appropriation for removing the bar at the mouth of Grand river, in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SOUTHARD submitted the following motion for consideration; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish to the Senate copies of such parts of the correspondence of the Department in relation to the construction of steam ships of war as he may regard as proper for publication, and useful for public information.

Mr. SOUTHARD also submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform the Senate, 1, What are the rank and commission which Lieutenant Charles Wilkes, jr. and Lieutenant William L. Hudson, now hold in the naval service of the United States; 2, Whether the said officers, or either of them, received from the Department or otherwise, before they left the United States, any other commission or authority as naval officers, or in any other, and in what respect or character, than as lieutenants in the navy; 3, Whether the Department has information that either, or both, of said officers have, since their departure from the United States, assumed and used any other, and what, uniform or flag above that of lieutenant, or lieutenant commanding, and if they have, by what right or authority the same has been done.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred the bill granting to the Mississippi and Rock River Canal Company a portion of the public lands for the purposes therein mentioned, reported it without amendment.

The bill for the relief of Captain Snodgrass's company of mounted volunteers was read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Lemuel White, was ordered to be engrossed.

After the consideration of Executive business,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.
WEDNESDAY, March 18, 1840.

Mr. PETER D. VROOM, Representative from the State of New Jersey, appeared, qualified, and took his seat.

On motion of Mr. Mr. TILLINGHAST, the resolution adopted by the Legislature of Rhode Island, in relation to the public lands, was taken from the SPEAKER'S table and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The CHAIR announced that the business first in order was the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections by Mr. CAMPBELL, their chairman, proposing to print all the testimony connected with the New Jersey contested election; and the amendment of Mr. R. GARLAND of Louisiana, to print other testimony referred to that committee, subsequent to its report.

Mr. BROWN of Tennessee, a member of the Committee of Elections, being entitled to the floor on this question, spoke in continuation of his remarks on yesterday, and in reply to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JENIFER.] He concluded, from the remarks of that gentleman, that it was his purpose to create the impression before the country that the committee had transcended its duties under the standing rules of the House. Mr. B. read the resolution referring the subject to the committee, by which he showed that the committee had, to the letter, complied with the requirements of the House, and had not transcended to the least degree its powers. Mr. B. in reply to Mr. JENIFER'S charge, that the committee had not considered the credentials of the Governor, said, and showed by the reading of the journal, that they were considered; that the certificates were twice read and fully investigated, and the parties fully heard on the matter; yet the gentleman has, by his remarks, sent the impression abroad that the committee had reported without such investigation. The gentleman from Maryland had, said Mr. B. further charged that the committee had not considered the testimony before making the report as to what set of claimants had a majority of the lawful votes; in proof that the charge was without foundation, he read from the journal of the committee, showing that the testimony was taken up and considered, on the resolution offered by Mr. BOTTS of Virginia, as follows:

Resolved That we will now take up the testimony which has been referred to the committee in the case of the New Jersey question.

Mr. B. then read from pages 74, 75, 76, 78, 79, 81, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, and 89, of the same journal, portions of the record, showing the fact that under this resolution the testimony was taken up, and read, and discussed, and that the parties were heard on the same. He read from the journal, on page 89, the entry, "and no further evidence being before the committee," on a resolution introduced by Mr. BOTTS, the committee proceeded to other business, &c.

The gentleman from Maryland, said Mr. B. made the charge that the committee had given a solemn pledge to the parties who had been sent home to take testimony, that it would not make a report until their return, and that it had violated that pledge by making a report in their absence. Mr. B. read from the 127th page of the journal of the committee the resolution, showing, conclusively, that the parties had been notified that the committee reserved to itself the right to make a preliminary report at any time it thought proper to do so. He showed, also, that the parties were present after the resolution had been introduced into the House requiring the committee to make a preliminary report.

Mr. B. was going into an examination of the other charges of Mr. JENIFER, and into a history of the proceedings of the committee, when he was interrupted by Mr. J. W. JONES, who said that the morning hour had expired, and called for the orders of the day.

Before passing to which, however,

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the War Department, enclosing a report from the Chief Engineer, in compliance with resolution of 25th February, 1839, showing what injury was done the property of Joseph H. Walters, in consequence of the improvements on Cape Fear river, North Carolina; which was read, and appropriately referred.

Also, a report from the Secretary of War, in compliance with a resolution of the House, showing the probable amount of claims against the United States, growing out of the Florida war; which was,

On motion of Mr. L. WILLIAMS, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Treasury Department, in compliance with a resolution of the 28th January, 1839, enclosing a statement of the amount of compensation, whether as fees or otherwise, which has been received by each district attorney, district clerk, and marshal, of the United States, during the year 1839; which was appropriately referred.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. DAWSON in Chair,) and took up

THE TREASURY NOTE BILL.

Mr. KING said it was known to every citizen of the United States that Treasury notes had now become a part of the currency of the country. He said the power to issue bills of credit was not given by the Constitution, but was actually withheld by the convention which formed the Constitution. Mr. K. said that, instead of relieving the country, Treasury notes embarrassed it. Whenever a bank or capitalist chooses to invest capital in these notes, the operation withdraws so much currency from circulation, and banks are obliged to refuse their customers so as to accommodate this great beggarly creditor—the Government. Instead of this being a measure of relief, it was turning the screw once more around. Mr. K. read from President Jackson's message portions of it to prove that a deep laid policy of a Government bank originated with the "Hero of Orleans," and also read extracts from President Van Buren's late annual message to prove that he also was in favor of a great bank, founded upon the revenues of the Government. He denounced the Sub-Treasury and Treasury note bill as a part of the scheme to bring about such an establishment. He contended that the specie clauses of the first named bill would be found to be impracticable.

Mr. K. concluded by condemning the effect which he believed would result from the establishment of the Independent Treasury, and its tendency to reduce the price of the lands of the West and all the productions of the country; and said the people had been cheated, deluded, and deceived, in respect to the cry of a separation of Bank and State.

Mr. K. then offered as a substitute for the Treasury Note bill, a bill authorizing a loan of five millions of dollars at a rate of interest.

Mr. BOND followed in opposition to the issue of Treasury notes, and in a general attack on the policy of the past and present Administrations; but before concluding his remarks, gave way to

Mr. UNDERWOOD, on whose motion the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then moved that the House adjourn; on which

Mr. LEWIS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 38, nays 56; no quorum voting.

Several motions were then made for calls of the House and for adjournment, on which the yeas and nays having been ordered, were withdrawn, when,

Mr. PROFFIT moved that the House adjourn, and demanded the yeas and nays on the motion; which not being ordered,

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,
THURSDAY, March 19, 1840.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Oswego, in the State of New York, praying the passage of a bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. T. gave notice that, on some future day, he would ask leave to bring in a bill establishing a general bankrupt law.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Brooklyn, N Y. praying the passage of a bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented the petition of inhabitants of the counties of Jefferson and Belmont, Ohio, praying an increase of the duties on foreign silks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the claim of James H. Clark, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. TAPPAN also, from the same committee, reported a bill granting a pension to Jacob Greaves; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. SMITH of Indiana, the bill to arrange the circuits of the Federal courts, was taken up, and Mr. S. submitted a substitute for the bill; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to provide compensation for injuries to property committed by marauding Indians; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MOUTON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill confirming the claim of John Baptiste Lecompte to a tract of land in Louisiana, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the petition of John Nantz, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINN, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Reuben E. Gentry, William Monroe, and others; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. L. submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of confirming to William Triplett his claim to a certain tract of land in the St. Louis land district in the State of Missouri.

Mr. LUMPKIN submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That during the remainder of the present session of Congress, the daily meetings of the Senate shall commence at 11 o'clock, a. m. until otherwise ordered.

Mr. NORVELL submitted the following motion; which was considered and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of re-establishing a military post at Detroit, and of erecting barracks and constructing fortifications for the protection of the same; for improving the forts at Gratiot, Mackinac, the Sault St. Marie, and Green Bay.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. SOUTHARD was agreed to.

The bill for the relief of Lemuel White was read a third time, and passed.

The bill to provide for the payment of damages sustained by individuals in the wars with the Indian tribes since 1830, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate then went into Executive session, and afterwards Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.
THURSDAY, March 19, 1840.

Mr. PARMENTER laid before the House other testimony in relation to the contested election of Massachusetts: which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

The CHAIR announced that the business first in order was the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections by Mr. CAMPBELL, their chairman, proposing to print all the testimony connected with the New Jersey contested election; and the amendment of Mr R. GARLAND of Louisiana, to print other testimony referred to that committee, subsequent to its report.

Mr. BROWN of Tennessee, a member of the committee, being still entitled to the floor on the above question, spoke in continuation of his remarks of yesterday. The burden of the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JENIFER,] it seemed to him, was, that this mysterious package, this new evidence, was not read before the committee. That evidence, or document, said Mr. B. never was before the committee, previous to the adoption of their report. It was sealed up and could not be inspected by the committee, without committing an act of great impropriety. This mysterious package was brought into the committee by the gentleman from Conn. [Mr. SMITH,] and a proposition was made that it should be opened by the chairman. The Chair said the package having been addressed to the SPEAKER of the House, and it not having been referred to the committee by the House, he had no authority to break the seal. The committee, save two, (Whigs,) coincided with the chairman that he had no right to open the package. It was then sent to the House and referred to the committee after the report was made, which report was only adopted by the committee and submitted to the House, after a full investigation of all the testimony before it. These gentlemen who complain that this testimony was not examined, never intimated till now that it comprised evidence of illegal votes, but was understood to be evidence merely going to show that the polls of South Amboy were irregularly held. This cry that there was evidence of illegal votes was an after-thought.

Mr. B. further said, that when the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. SMITH] brought forward in committee a resolution, that the sealed package should be sent to the SPEAKER to be opened by him, and be referred to the committee, only two belonging to the Opposition voted for the adoption of the resolution. Mr. B. said that this testimony was a part of that now being taken to settle the ultimate right of members to seats under a resolution adopted by the committee, and was not the evidence on which to decide the prima facie right as to who ought to be the sitting members. Mr. B. maintained that the Chair would have been liable to pains and penalties if he had opened that sealed package. He then adverted to the ex post facto law which had been passed by the Legislature of New Jersey to meet this particular case. That law makes it the duty of the commissioner to take testimony, to seal it up, and to deliver it in person, or to transmit it, to the Speaker. Instead of this package taking the course indicated by the law of New Jersey, it was found on the desk of the chairman of the committee, without having been first sent to the Speaker, or without his knowledge that it was in the city. It was, under such circumstances, emphatically denominated a suspicious package. It seems that it came to this city enclosed in an envelope addressed to a private individual, in violation of the law above alluded to. The only thing certain or known about it was that it appeared on the table of the chairman of the committee. The opinion of the chairman and the committee was a correct opinion, that it would have been highly unjust and improper to break the seal and act on the testimony, without the knowledge of the House that it was before the committee, particularly when the evidence was taken to decide another right, and not the right which the committee was then called upon to report. He said the committee had toiled by night and by day in investigating the evidence on which its report was based, and before it was made. The majority of the committee, after that investigation, were utterly astonished that any doubt had existed that the Democratic claimants were elected and entitled to the seats. The "foul deed" of depriving the State of New Jersey of her due representation, of which that House had heard so much, was committed by the Governor of New Jersey. That officer knew that the gentlemen he commissioned had not received a majority of the votes, and that they were not elected. The proceedings of that Governor and his Privy Council, a record of which was before the committee, and the correctness of which no living man had dared to call into question, showed that fact. The law of New Jersey required the Governor to send for the absent returns before he issued his certificate, yet the Governor failed to do, in this respect, as the law and his oath required him to do. He knew that by giving certificates he could make members for a little time, to carry out his purposes; but the record to which he before adverted proved beyond cavil that the Governor and Privy Council had no doubt that they would not be permitted to hold their seats permanently in virtue of those certificates. The committee, therefore, by its action, of which certain gentlemen so loudly complained, had done nothing more than realize the prophecy of the Governor, by placing the Democratic claimants in the vacant seats. Their right to seats could have been decided by a good arithmetician in one hour after the testimony had been submitted to him, and investigated by him; but the committee had been four weeks ascertaining the fact, and yet gentlemen of the Opposition complained that it had acted with precipitancy. But the chief complaint of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] and others acting with him, in relation to the report of the committee, was, not that the facts in the body of the report were untrue, but that the title page was wrong, because it contained the word lawful. He was confident that the people would look beyond the title page of that report—they would go into the body of it to ascertain the truth, and the objection of the gentlemen to the report, on this ground, would avail them but little.

The committee, in making the report as to which of the claimants had the greatest number of lawful votes, took as the basis of their proceeding the resolution adopted in the earliest stage of their proceeding, "that all the votes received by authorized officers, acting in conformity with law, were prima facie legal," until the contrary should be shown. Now here was a resolution adopted unanimously by the committee, as a basis for their future action, and which the committee scrupulously followed in their report; and yet gentlemen now pretend to say that the committee acted without authority. Surely gentlemen, in making use of this afterthought, must have forgotten this resolution, which they themselves had adopted. The report of the committee, therefore, was but an echo and embodyment of the principle contained in that resolution. Mr. B. went into a detailed examination of the proceedings of the committee, to show the impediments thrown in their way by the gentlemen who now complained that they had reported without proper consideration; but before he concluded his remarks, (which will be published in full hereafter,) he was arrested by Mr. J. W. JONES, who said the morning hour had expired, and called for the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER embraced that opportunity, and laid before the House the following communications:

1. A letter from the Postmaster General, in compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 9th inst. relative to the removal of the city post office; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the Third Auditor, in reply to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 9th inst. in relation to the settlement of the claim for horses lost during the late hostilities with the Creek and Seminole Indians in Alabama and Florida, by the Alabama volunteers: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

3. Also, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 24th ultimo, calling upon the War Department to communicate such information as it may be possessed of, relative to the causes requiring troops to guard the payments of annuities to Indians on the Des Moines river: referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

4. The memorial of Lemuel Wheelock and others, legal voters in the Sixth Congressional District, against the right of Osmyn Baker to a seat in the House of Representatives: referred to the Committee of Elections.

5. A letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting a report of allowances made to contractors within the year ending the 1st July, 1839, &c.: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

6. Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 9th instant, transmitting statements of moneys invested in the stocks of the several States: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

7. Letter from the Secretary of the Navy, in compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 9th instant, transmitting copies of the correspondence on file in the Navy Department between Admiral Baudin, of the French navy, and Commodore W. B. Shubrick, of the United States navy, at Pensacola, during the month of June last: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

8. Depositions in relation to the New Jersey election.

On motion of Mr. RICE GARLAND, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CHINN gave notice that he would, at a proper time, introduce a bill to abolish the land district in Louisiana, known as the Greensburg and Southeastern district, and to establish a new one, to be designated as the —— district, and for other purposes.

On motion, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWSON in the chair,) and took up

THE TREASURY NOTE BILL.

Mr. BOND, who was entitled to the floor, spoke in continuation of his remarks of yesterday. He examined the policy of the past and present Administrations, and denounced it as injurious to the best interests of the country.

Mr. VANDERPOEL followed in reply to Messrs. CUSHING, BOND, and KING, and in support of the bill, and in an able vindication of the past and present Administrations from the charges of those gentlemen. He showed that the issue of the Treasury notes was constitutional, contending that that right was involved in the right of the Government to borrow money, which none of these gentlemen denied it had the power to do. He showed from official documents, in reply to the argument of Mr. CUSHING, that the expenditures of the Government during the past and present Administrations had not increased in a greater ratio than the increase in the population and resources of the country. He also showed that one great cause of the increase of the civil list was the extravagant increase of the contingent expenses of the House, growing out of the system put on foot by the Opposition, of printing panic and electioneering documents. His remarks will be published hereafter in full.

Mr. TRUMBULL next obtained the floor, on whose motion the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. ANDREWS,

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, March 20, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a communication from the Secretary of War, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate in relation to the payment of the debts and the removal of the Winnebago Indians; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the petition of Prudence C. Loring for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, a memorial of citizens of Western Michigan, praying an amendment to the pre-emption laws; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a memorial praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, several memorials on the subject of the abolition of slavery; the motion to receive which was laid on the table.

Mr. PRESTON presented the memorial of the heirs of General Everard Meade; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. MERRICK presented a communication from the banks of the District of Columbia, presenting an exhibit of their situation and resources; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. BENTON presented a memorial, praying the establishment of a post route in Monroe county, Mo.; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. B. also presented a document in relation to Spanish claims in Missouri; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a memorial from inhabitants of Missouri, praying for an alteration of the pre-emption laws; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROANE presented the memorial of William Brent, jr.; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. GRUNDY presented a memorial from members of the bar in East Tennessee, praying for an additional term in each year of the District Court in Tennessee; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALL presented a memorial from citizens of the United States, praying for an increase of duty on imported silks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BENTON presented a document containing a summary of the proceedings of the British Mint for the last twenty-on years; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. YOUNG presented two petitions for post routes—one from Davenport, Iowa, to Peru, Ill. and another from Springfied to Dubuque; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. KING presented additional testimony in relation to the claim of Jubal B. Hancock; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PORTER presented a memorial, praying an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Port Sheldon; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of A. C. Hollinger, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill to confirm the title of the heirs of Joeph Thomson to a ratct of land in the State of Missouri; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for property destroyed or plundered by predatory bands of Indians, belonging to Messrs. Myers, Reid, Gross, and Allen, of Missouri.

Mr. WEBSTER submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury inform the Senate what proportion of Treasury notes, issued under the authority of the act of October 12, 1837, and subsequent acts, has been paid to public creditors of the United States in discharge of their claims, and what proportion has been used for the purpose of raising money from banks or individuals; together with a statement of the rates of interest borne by the notes of the several issues respectively. And that he also inform the Senate whether the Treasury notes bearing interest have been deposited in banks for the purpose of raising a credit, and to be drawn against by the Treasury Department; and if any such deposites have been made, to state the dates and amounts thereof, and the dates and sums of the drafts made thereon.

Mr. NORVELL submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate such information as may be in possession of the Department on the subject of the application of a mineral solution to the preservation of timber, called "Kyanising," in the report of the bureau of the Topographical Engineers, with the effect, mode of application, and cost of timber so prepared, particularly in reference to the construction of piers, jettees, and other similar works, as well as for naval structure.

The resolution submitted yesterday, by Mr. LUMPKIN, proposing to substitute 11 for 12 as the hour of meeting of the Senate, being taken up, after some remarks from Messrs. LUMPKIN, HUBBARD, and KING, it was laid on the table for the present.

The bill to provide for the payment of damages sustained by individuals in the wars with the Indian tribes since 1830, coming up on its third reading,

Mr. LUMPKIN moved to recommit the bill back to the Committee on Claims, with instructions to strike out that clause which required the Third Auditor to report the claims to Congress, before they were settled.

The recommitment was further advocated by Messrs. LUMPKIN and CLAY of Alabama, and opposed by Mr. WRIGHT; and, the question being taken, it was decided in the negative—ayes 9, noes 19.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

The Senate then went into Executive session, and afterwards Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY March 20, 1840.

The journal having been read,

Mr. RIVES said he did not find, from the reading of the record, any notice of the motion he made to refer to the Committee of Elections the additional evidence laid before the House on yesterday by the SPEAKER, in relation to the New Jersey contested election. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. R. GARLAND] move to lay it on the table; and he [Mr. R.] made the motion to refer it to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. R. then made a motion that it be amended in that particular; which was agreed to.

The CHAIR announced that the business first in order was the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections by Mr. CAMPBELL, their chairman, proposing to print all the testimony connected with the New Jersey contested election; and the amendment of Mr. R. GARLAND of Louisiana to discharge the Committee of Elections from the further consideration of the papers in relation to the New Jersey question.

Mr. CAMPBELL, chairman of the Committee of Elections, said he had been instructed by that committee to move a resolution, as a modification of the one now before the House, so as to have the report made on the 15th instant included in the proposition to print.

Messrs. TRIPLETT and STANLY objected.

Mr. CAMPBELL said it was a matter of very little consequence. The motion was made to save the time of the House; but as it was objected to he would not press it.

Mr. BROWN of Tennessee continued his argument from the point at which he left off yesterday, and took up, and successfully refuted, the objections made by the Opposition members of the committee to the instructions of the House, under which they had acted. The great objection was, not against the right of the House to give such instructions, or the competency of the committee to make such a report, but that the chairman of the Military Committee [Mr. JOHNSON of Tennessee] had moved the instructions, and thus interfered with the affairs of the Committee of Elections. The gentleman from Connecticut took great alarm at the word "forthwith;" and every body recollected the eloquent appeal of the gentleman to the House, to save the committee from the intrusions of this man of war. They might almost apprehend, from the gentleman's alarming forebodings, that this warlike individual would rush into the committee room, pull down their chairs and tables, and turn the committee neck and heels out of doors. The gentleman in portraying the daring usurpations which had been attempted by the chairman of the Military Committee, threw back their attention to a scene in the French Chamber of Deputies, when Napolean entered at the head of his grenadiers, and turned the deputies out of doors. But when he turned aside from the contemplation of the gentleman's gloomy picture, and looked at the calm and placid countenance of his friend from Tennessee, he forgot the scene in the French Chamber of Deputies, and thought how little likely it was that any outrage on the rights of the House, or the committee, could be committed through his agency. Indeed he was forcibly reminded of the truth of the maxim, that there is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous. After answering the other objections made to the instructions of the House, Mr. B. took up the complaints make against the House for having confirmed the report. The majority of the House had been charged with having acted with indecent hurry, with madness and blindness; and he would appeal to the sober second thoughts of the minority of the committee who made this charge, whether the facts of the case would justify them in the use of such uncourteous language. Did not the records show that the House was in possession of all the evidence material to the case decided on? Was not that decision made after a long and protracted debate, when every gentleman who desired it, had been heard on the subject? And again, it had unjustly and falsely been alleged that the majority of the House had brought in these five New Jersey members to enable them to carry out some favorite measure of the Administration. Did the gentleman allude to the Sub-Treasury bill, to the resolution against the assumption of the State debts, or to any other of these great measures on which it was well known that there was a large majority of the House committed before these members came in? But see the inconsistency of this part of the gentleman's argument. The House, by a large majority, at least thirty, voted in these five members; they had a majority sufficiently large to commit what the gentleman considers such a gross outrage, and with such indecent hurry, and yet with this large majority, they wanted these five additional members to enable them to carry out their favorite measures. The inconsistency and absurdity of this argument carried with it its own refutation.

Mr. B. next answered the complaint made, that the House would not give the minority the liberty of submitting their report, and showed that, on the day it was offered, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] moved to suspend the rules to receive it, when the House was engaged on the majority report, and the motion failed because it was known, and it was so decided by the SPEAKER, that, if it prevailed, it would supersede the action of the House on the majority report. But, at the first moment after the majority report was decided on, the gentleman from Virginia again offered his report, when it was received by general consent, and the question of rec ption was supposed to be decided, when the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GARLAND] objected to its being received in this way, and demanded the yeas and nays. The report of the minority, therefore, was kept back by the minority, as the records would show, and it would here be recollected that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CALHOUN] objected to the reception, and said that he wished it to go forth as a suppressed report.

It appeared, then, that the minority wanted their report to be received at a time that it would set aside the report of the majority; and, because they could not get that, they raised the cry that it was suppressed. The gentleman, he said, had appealed from the decision of this House to the people. It was before that tribunal that he and his friends desired to meet them. We, said he have been the advocates of the right of the people to choose their own Representatives—the gentlemen in the minority have been the advocates of the right of the Governor of New Jersey and his broad seal to set aside the will of the people. Let all the facts fairly and truly go before the people, and he did not fear the result.

After answering the arguments of the gentlemen in the Opposition in full Mr. B. concluded, when

Mr. WATTERSON moved the previous question; but the House refused to second it—ayes 58, noes 77.

Mr. BOTTS then obtained the floor, and desired to know if any gentleman of the majority of the committee wished to address the House on the subject. If so, he would give way, as he preferred following in reply. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES] introduced the subject, and there were three other members of the majority of the committee yet to speak on it. As he then was the only member of the minority that intended to address the House on this subject, he thought it but fair that he should have the benefit of making the last speech.

Mr. RIVES of Virginia begged leave to correct the gentleman. He did not introduce the subject, and had only spoken in explanation to correct the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER.]

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana said that he had submitted the amendment on which the debate was proceeding, and he thought that if any one had the right to make the concluding speech he had.

Mr. CAMPBELL observed that the majority of the committee were willing to rest the case, on their part, upon the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BROWN.] But if the gentleman from Virginia, or any other gentleman, addressed the House, with any arguments necessary to be answered, the members of the committee of course reserved to themselves the right of replying.

Mr. FISHER observed that he was one of those who desired to address the House on this subject, and that he had endeavored to obtain the floor at the time that his friend from Tennessee did. But, said he, if we look at the nature of the debate, it will be perceived that it is not necessary for any member of the committee to continue it. What was the debate. It was an attack upon the committee, impugning their motives and conduct. They had been arraigned here and out of the House. All that we have to do is to reply to the charges that have been made against us. This had been done, and successfully done. We have, said he, successfully defended ourselves, and triumphantly refuted the charges that have been made against us. I am, therefore, willing to rest the case with the able and unanswerable speech of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BROWN.] We do wish to make any charges, and do not feel under the necessity of making any other speeches unless new matter is indroduced, and new charges made. In that case we reserve the right to reply to them.

Mr. BOTTS then proceeded in another attack on the majority of the committee, going over the same ground which had been previously occupied by those who had preceded him on the same side of the question. He had not concluded when the the morning hour expired; at which time,

Mr. J. W. JONES said it must be obvious to the House that speedy action was necessary on the Treasury note bill. He, therefore, moved that the rules be suspended to enable him to submit a motion to go into committee on that bill; and on that motion he demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. RUSSELL hoped, inasmuch as this day was set apart for the consideration of private bills, that the rules would not be suspended.

The question was then taken, and the rules were not suspended—yeas 103, nays 72.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the War Department, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 9th instant, explanatory of his plan in detail for the organization of the militia of the United States.

Mr. WISE said he would like to have an additional number of this document, and moved to print 5,000 copies extra; but at the suggestion of Mr. STANLY, he withdrew the motion.

Mr. HUBBARD renewed the motion, and

Mr. STANLY objected.

Mr. HUBBARD withdrew the motion.

The question was then taken, and the usual quantity was ordered to be printed.

Several Senate bills on the SPEAKER'S table were then taken up on their reference, read twice, and appropriately committed.

On motion, the House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DAVEE in the chair, and considered various bills on the private calendar.

The committee resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of Thomas Fillebrown; and, the motion to strike out the enacting clause having been withdrawn, it was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

The bill for the relief of Sylvester Phelps and the heirs of Charles Landon, coming up in its order,

Mr. PETRIKIN opposed the bill in a few remarks, and moved to strike out the enacting clause.

Messrs. GIDDINGS and LEET replied in favor of the bill, and in explanation of its principles; when

The question was taken on striking out the enacting clause, and decided in the negative, and it was ordered that the bill should be laid aside and reported to the House.

The bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to remit duties upon certain goods destroyed by fire at the late conflagration in the city of New York, in December, 1835," passed July 7, 1838, was taken up in its order.

After some remarks by Messrs. PETRIKIN, RHETT, and HOLLEMAN, in opposition to the principle involved in the bill, Mr. RHETT moved to strike out its enacting clause, when Messrs CURTIS, HOFFMAN, THOMPSON of South Carolina, GRINNELL, MONROE, HABERSHEM, DAWSON, UNDERWOOD, and PARMENTER, followed in reply, and in favor of the bill.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out the enacting clause, and it was disagreed to—ayes 58, noes 67.

Messrs. DAWSON and PARMENTER proposed amendments to the bill, which were disagreed to.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved an amendment extending the principle of relief to all the merchants in other cities who had their goods destroyed by fire, and upon which duties had been paid to the Government; but the amendment having been disagreed to,

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

On motion of Mr. GRIFFIN, the committee then rose and reported many bills to the House, without amendment, and asked leave to sit again on others, which leave was granted.

Mr. TURNEY moved that when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next; on which,

Mr. LEWIS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 32, nays 67.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi moved that the House adjourn; on which

Mr. RUSSELL demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 62, nays 68.

So the House refused to adjourn.

One of the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole having been read, and the question being on ordering it to be engrossed,

Mr. PETRIKIN moved that the House adjourn, on which,

Mr. LEWIS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 49, nays 66. No quorum voting.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana moved a call of the House; which was disagreed to.

Mr. PETRIKIN again moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana demanded the yeas; which not having been ordered,

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, March 21, 1840.

Mr. WELLER asked leave to introduce a resolution, which was read for the information of the House, as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of three be appointed to ascertain and report whether any officer of this House has, during the present session, furnished stationery to any person not entitled, by law, to the same; also to report the probable value thereof.

Mr. CHINN moved so to amend the resolution so as extend the inquiry to members of the House.

Mr. DAWSON was here understood to object, and made some remarks which were not distinctly heard.

Mr. WELLER replied that his resolution did not propose an examination of the fact whether members of Congress used more stationery than was necessary for the transaction of their business, for of this the members themselves must be the judges; but he had understood that some of the officers of this House had been in the habit of furnishing stationery to letter-writers, reporters, and others, not embraced within the law. Now, he simply proposed an examination into the truth of this allegation. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] might thank this a "trifling" matter, but he was one of those who believed that all abuses of this sort should be corrected. He was unwilling that the people of this country should be taxed to purchase stationery for letter-writers and others who saw proper to lounge about the Capitol during the session of Congress. He cared not who the resolution might operate upon, the practice to which he adverted was a violation of the law, and should not be tolerated.

Mr. DAWSON had so much confidence in the Clerk, who had charge of the stationery, that he believed he would not let it be improperly used; and he therefore objected to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. CRAIG said, notwithstanding it was considered a small matter by some, he moved a suspension of the rules, and, on that motion, demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken on suspending the rules, and decided in the negative.

Mr. JAMESON, on leave, and in accordance with notice previously given, introduced a bill for the relief of Alford George; and a bill for the benefit of William Thompson; which were read twice, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. GALBRAITH gave notice that he would, at a proper time, ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the improvement of the Alleghany river.

Mr. MARVIN gave notice that he would, at an early day, ask leave to introduce the usual bill for the improvements of rivers and harbors.

The CHAIR announced that the business first in order was the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections by Mr. CAMPBELL, their chairman, proposing to print all the testimony connected with the New Jersey contested election; and the amendment of Mr. R. GARLAND of Louisiana to discharge the Committee of Elections from the further consideration of the papers in relation to the New Jersey question.

Mr. BOTTS, who was entitled to the floor on the above question, not being in his seat,

Mr. HOPKINS, from the select committe, appointed on the 9th instant, to inquire whether any of the officers of the House were engaged in the prosecution of private claims before Congress, by permission of the House, introduced a resolution empowering the committee to send for persons and papers; which resolution was agreed to.

Mr. S. WILLIAMS moved that the House agree to receive reports from committees during the morning hour.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi objected; whereupon,

Mr. S. WILLIAMS moved a suspension of the rules for that purpose; which motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Maine said a number of the States had not been afforded an opportunity, except on one occasion, to present petitions to the House. He really hoped that this occasion would be embraced by the House to enable gentleman who had not been afforded an opportunity, to present their petitions during the remainder of the morning hour.

Objection having been made,

Mr. SMITH moved to suspend the rules for the purpose.

Mr. ADAMS inquired what was the object of the gentleman's motion.

Mr. SMITH replied, to call the States for petitions during the morning hour.

Mr. ADAMS. If that was the gentleman's object, he was sincerely happy to find that the gentleman was an advocate for reception of petitions.

Mr. SMITH said, having so powerful a co-operator as the gentleman from Massachusetts, I am sure there can be no objection to the motion.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules; and it was disagreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi did not see why the House should pass over this business. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] it was true, had the floor, and it seemed to him that if he wished to claim it he ought to be here. Mr. T. did not know what had been the practice of the House on similar occasions, but he was under the impression that the House had not heretofore passed over the business in order because of the absence of a member entitled to the floor. It was the duty of the gentleman to be here, and as he was not, the House ought to go on without him.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina moved a call of the House; but

Mr. BOTTS then appearing in his seat,

Mr. WILLIAMS withdrew his motion.

Mr. BOTTS then resumed his remarks in continuation of those of yesterday. As the majority of the committee, he said, had announced that they had nothing further to say on the subject, unless some new charges should be made against them, and, as he had no new charges to make, but should confine himself to the old ones, he thought it but right that he should have the advantage of closing this debate. As the committee, however, would not allow him this privilege, he should now proceed with his remarks. Mr. B. then continued his argument, examining and commenting on the journal of the committee, for the purpose of sustaining the charge that had been made by Mr. FILLMORE and Mr. JENIFER, and refuted by Mr. BROWN of Tennessee.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said he could not permit any opportunity to pass by without urging the House to take up the Treasury Note bill. He asked for a suspension of the rules, to enable him to make a motion that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider that bill; and demanded the yeas and nays on that motion, which were ordered; and were yeas 113, nays 68, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Judson Allen, H. J. Anderson, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Biddle, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, John Campbell, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Coles, Conner, Wm. R. Cooper, Cross, Cushing, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Wagener, Watterson, Welier, Wick, Jared W. Williams, and Henry Williams—103.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bond, Botts, Brockway, Calhoun, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Edward Davies, Deberry, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Granger, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Hawes, Henry, John Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hook, James, Kempshall, Lincoln, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Nisbet, Osborne, Pope, Randall, Rariden, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Simonton, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Underwood, Warren, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Sherrod Williams—68.

So the rules were not suspended.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Smith and Farnsworth, was taken up, read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Bailey and Delord was taken up on its second reading; when

Mr. RUSSELL moved an amendment; which was agreed to.

Several other amendments having been offered, a debate arose, in which Messrs. HAND, L. WILLIAMS, RUSSELL, DAWSON, and SMITH participated; when,

On motion of Mr. HAND, the further consideration of the bill was postponed till Friday next, and the amendments and papers connected with the bill, were, in the mean time, ordered to be printed.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Fillebrown was taken up on its second reading, read the second time, and, after a debate on its merits, in which Messrs. LEADBETTER and PETRIKIN participated in opposition, and Messrs. POPE, LEET, and EVANS in favor of the bill, and the question being on its engrossment for a third reading,

Mr. HUBBARD demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 80, nays 61.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

The following bills were then taken up, read the second time, and severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, viz:

A bill for the relief of Bates and Lacon;
A bill for the relief of James W. Osborne;
A bill for the relief of Daniel D. Walker, of Baltimore;
A bill for the relief of Chostelain and Pouvert;

A bill for the relief of Garret Vliet;
A bill for the relief of Cornelius Tiers;
A bill for the relief of John Underwood;
A bill for the relief of Josiah Thompson;
A bill for the relief of Thomas Fillebrown;
A bill for the relief of Sylvester Phelps, and heirs of Charles Landon.
A bill for the relief of John T. Addoms;
A bill for the relief of Captain John Downes;
A bill for the relief of Benjamin C. Roberts;
A bill for the relief of Boggs and Thompson, Robert and Thomas Hutchinson, and others;
A bill for the relief of Meigs D Benjamin and Co.
A bill for the relief of Wm. Wickham;
A bill for the relief of John M. Jacquelin; and A bill for the relief of George Willis.

On motion of Mr. TURNEY,

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, March 23, 1840.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented a memorial of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the petition of James Morgan; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a memorial of citizens of Stark county, Ohio, asking for an increase of the tariff, and the distribution of the public lands; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures, and the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a memorial remonstrating against the annexation of Texas; which was laid on the table.

Also, a memorial from citizens of Mercer and Beaver counties, praying that proper measures may be taken for a recognition of the independence of Hayti, and for the establishment of diplomatic and commercial relations with that Republic on the same footing as with the most favored nations; which was laid on the table.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of Kentucky, in opposition to any measure which would cede the public lands to the States in which they lie; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial of citizens of Fulton county, New York, in favor of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a memorial of citizens of the State of Delaware, praying that this Government may unite with other Governments in causing a survey of the isthmus of Darien, to ascertain the practicability of cutting a canal across said isthmus, and if found to be so, then to unite with said nations in carrying the project into effect; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TAPPAN presented a memorial of citizens of Ohio, praying for the imposition of a duty on foreign silk; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TAPPAN also presented the memorial of one hundred and one citizens of the First Ward of the city of Washington, principally mechanics and workingmen, asking Congress to take measures to compel the banks of the District to resume specie payments; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBINSON presented the petition of McCurdy and Whiteside; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented the memorial of citizens of Harrison county, Ohio, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; the motion to receive which, was,

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, laid on the table.

Mr. KING presented a memorial of William E. Kennedy; which was referred to the Committee on private Land Claims.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a memorial of sea captains, traders, merchants, and citizens, of Georgetown, South Carolina, praying for the erection of a light house at that port; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BENTON presented the memorial of Anthony Drane; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred

The petition of the widow of John Vial:
The petition of the widow of Jonathan Tewgood;
The petition of the widow of George Hood;
The memorial of Joel Leftwich: and
The petition of James Pierce;

made unfavorable reports thereon.

Mr. ROANE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the memorial of the United States Insurance Company and of the Insurance Company of the State of Pennsylvania, praying to be indemnified for property seized and sequestered by the Government of Hayti in 1814, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. MOUTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the memorial on the subject, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Aaron Vail, late Consul at L'Orient; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Elliot Smith and Nathan Farnsworth, was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The resolution submitted on Friday by Mr. WEBSTER, was considered, and agreed to.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business,

And afterwards adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, March 23, 1840.

The SPEAKER laid before the House further depositions in relation to the New Jersey contested election; which were ordered to lie on the table.

This being the day under the rule for the presentation of resolutions,

The SPEAKER commenced the call of the States for that purpose, commencing with the State of Maine, when

Mr. EVANS presented a resolution to instruct the Committee of Claims to inquire into the propriety of granting a pension to Margaret McIntire; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLIFFORD said only one opportunity had been afforded for the presentation of petitions; and inasmuch as frequent opportunities had been afforded for the presentation of resolutions, he moved a suspension of the rules, to enable gentlemen to hand in their petitions, and called for tellers on that motion; and Messrs. RAMSEY and CHAPMAN of Alabama having been appointed such, reported that there were—ayes 77, noes 31, no quorum voting.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved a called of the House; which was not ordered.

Mr. ADAMS demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules for the reception of petitions; which were ordered, and were yeas 107, nays 62.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. J. W. JONES said he must again ask for a suspension of the rules for the purpose of going into committee on the Treasury note bill. The pressing necessity of the case, in his judgment, rendered it absolutely necessary that speedy action should be had on this bill. He demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend; which were ordered, and were as follows, —yeas 112, nays 67:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Burke, William O. Butler, Bynum, John Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Conner, Mark A. Cooper, Wm. R. Cooper, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Davis, Dawson, Dickerson, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Galbraith, Gerry, Goggin, Habersham, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Kemble, Kille, King, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Marchand, Marvin, Medill, Miller, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parmenter, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rhett, Robinson, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Albert Smith, John Smith, Steenrod, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweeny, Taliaferro, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, W. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Trumbull, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Worthington—112.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Botts, Albert G. Brown, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Corwin, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Deberry, Dillett, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goode, Graves, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, James, Kempshall, Lincoln, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Nisbet, Osborne, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Rariden, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stuart, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Underwood, Warren, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—67.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. MARVIN, in accordance with previous notice given, asked leave to introduce the usual bill making appropriation for the continuation and improvements in rivers and harbors.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked if it would be in order to raise the question of reception.

The CHAIR said it was a motion for leave, which was substantially a question of reception.

Some conversation of a desultory character here arose, and the leave was objected to.

The CHAIR decided that in consequence of the objection and debate arising, the question of leave must lie over under the rule.

Mr. MARVIN referred to the former practice of the House, and believing that the decision of the CHAIR, that the rule which compelled resolutions causing debate to lie over, did not apply to propositions for leave, he must take an appeal.

Mr. PETRIKIN, to save all difficulty, withdrew his question of reception, and moved the previous question on the appeal, which was seconded, and the main question ordered, which main question was, "shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. STANLY moved to lay the question of leave on the table.

Mr. CASEY demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and were—yeas 93, nays 78, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Burke, S. H. Butler, Bynum, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chapman, Chinn, Clifford, Coles, Colquitt, Conner, Mark A. Cooper, W. R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, J. Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dickerson, Doan, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, Gentry, Gerry, Goggin, Graham, Green, Griffin, Habersham, Hammond, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hook, Hubbard, Jackson, J. Johnson, N. Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, King, Leadbetter, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McCarty, McClellan, McKay, Miller, Montgomery, S. W. Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Parish, Parmenter, Petrikin, Pickens, Ramsey, Rhett, James Rogers, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Stanly, Starkweather, Steenrod, Sumter, Swearingen, P. F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Underwood, David D. Wagener, Warren, Watterson, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, J. L. Williams, and C. H. Williams—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, J. W. Allen, Barnard, Beatty, Bell, Brewster, Brockway, W. O. Butler, Calhoun, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chittenden, Clark, Jas. Cooper, Corwin, Cranston, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Cushing, Dana, Davee, E. Davies, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Dillett, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fine, Galbraith, Rice Garland, Gates, Giddings, Goode, Hand, W. S. Hastings, Hoffman, Howard, James, Kempshall, Kille, Lincoln, Marchand, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Montanya, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Osborne, Paynter, Proffit, Randall, Rariden, Reed, Reynolds, Robinson, Russell, Saltonstall, Simonton, Slade, Albert Smith, John Smith, Truman Smith, Storrs, Stuart, Sweeny, Taylor, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, John White, and Worthington—78.

So the motion for leave was laid on the table.

Mr. MARK A. COOPER gave notice that he will, at some future day, ask leave to introduce a bill to repeal the laws fixing salaries for Chaplains for this House and the Senate.

Mr. PETRIKIN gave notice that he will on Wednesday next, or on some other day, when it shall be in order to do so, ask leave to read in his place a bill to repeal the second section of "Act concerning public contracts," passed 21st April, 1808.

Mr. BARNARD, in accordance with notice previously given, asked and obtained leave, and introduced a bill making an appropriation for continuing the improvements in Hudson river; which was read twice, and, on his motion, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, with the following instructions, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to continue the works in progress for the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson river above and below Albany; and also to inquire into the expediency of making appropriations for continuing the works heretofore begun, and yet incomplete, for the improvement of harbors and other rivers.

The following resolution, introduced by Mr. LOWELL, on the 10th of February, was, on his motion, taken up, and adopted:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the House all the information in his possession, or in the possession of either of the Executive Departments, in relation to the seizure and condemnation by the British authorities, during the season last past, of certain American vessels engaged in the fisheries.

Mr. LOWELL also introduced the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the papers on file in relation to the petition of Polly Hamilton, on which an adverse report was made by the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, on the 5th of March instant, be taken from the files and recommitted to said committee.

On motion of Mr. BURKE,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route, commencing at Keene, in the county of Cheshire, New Hampshire, and extending thence through the towns of Gilsum, Marlow, Lempster, and Goshen, to Newport, in the county of Sullivan, New Hampshire.

On motion of Mr. J. W. WILLIAMS,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of compensating Sally Stanley for the Revolutionary services of her husband.

Mr. ADAMS offered the following resolutions, which were adopted.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to report to this House a statement of all the sums of money belonging to the navy pension fund which have at any time been invested in stocks of the several States; specifying the authority by which such investments have been made, the dates of such investments, the rates at which the several purchases of the stocks have been made, and the dates and rates at which they have been sold.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, all the correspondence between the Department of State and the diplomatic functionaries of the United States in France, Sweden, Denmark, and Prussia, and with those Governments, or either of them, relating to the surrender to the Government of the United States of persons charged with piracy and murder on board of the United States schooner Plattsburg, in the year 1817. Also, the correspondence relating to the demand, by the Charge d'Affaires of Great Britain, for the surrender of a mutineer in the British armed ship Lee, in 1819, and any opinion of the Attorney General of the United States with regard to the right of the Executive of the United States, or of any of the Executive Governments of the separate States of this Union, to deliver up, at the demand of any foreign Government, persons charged with crimes committed without the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. ADAMS also offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the practice, first openly avowed at the present session of Congress, of pairing off, involves, on the part of the members resorting to it, the violation of the Constitution of the United States, of an express rule of this House, and of the duties of both parties in the transaction to their immediate constituents, to this House, and their country.

He was accompanying the resolution with some remarks, not heard by the Reporter, when objection was made to any debate.

Mr. A. said he did not propose to debate the resolution, but he considered it of very great importance, on account of the principles involved; and he wanted to see whether it could be possible that any member of this House would object to it.

Mr. GRAVES objected; when

The SPEAKER said the resolution must lie over.

Mr. ADAMS remonstrated, and there was some confusion, but the resolution was laid over.

Mr. ADAMS wished to modify a resolution offered by him on the 10th of February last, which is in the words following:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, copies of any demand made by the minister or other diplomatic representative of Spain in this country, of the surrender to him of the Africans taken in, or belonging to, the vessel called L'Amistad, and of all correspondence between this Government and the said minister or diplomatic representative relating thereto: also, copies of all instructions from the Department of State to the District Attorney of the United States in the judicial district of Connecticut, and all reports of the said District Attorney to the said Department relating to that subject.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected, and a desultory conversation ensued: but Mr. A. was finally permitted to modify, which he did, so as to extend the call by adding "or any other foreign Government or Minister."

Mr. REID offered the following, which, under the rule, lies over:

Resolved, That it is the bounden duty of the Government of the United States to absolutely prohibit her citizens from engaging, directly or indirectly, in the foreign slave trade; and, to this end, that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of making such legal provisions as shall effectually put an end to so unlawful and disgraceful a traffic.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING,

Resolved, That the resolutions of the last Congress, on the subject of the territory and rights of the United States west of the Rocky mountains, and the papers accompanying the same, be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

On motion of Mr. SALTONSTALL,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to report to this House the amount of the annual payments from the privateer pension fund established by the act of June 26, 1812, until the same was exhausted, distinguishing what portion of said payments was paid to the widows and children of deceased persons, and to report also when the same became exhausted, and whether any part, and, if so, how much, of said fund was lost by the manner in which the same was invested.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the House the correspondence between the delegation in Congress from the State of Massachusetts and himself, in the month of March, 1839, in relation to the examination and allowance of the claim of that State to compensation for militia services during the last war with Great Britain, and that he also inform the House whether, since his report on that subject of the 23d of December, 1837, under a resolution of the House of Representatives of March, 1836, any further proceedings have been had, or are deemed necessary on the part of Massachusetts, or in the Department, to entitle the State to the balance found due according to his said report.

On motion of Mr. W. B. CALHOUN,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs inquire into the expediency of purchasing of John W. Cochran, his six pounder brass cannon model, for a large garrison gun for naval defence.

Mr. OSBORNE submitted the following, which lies over:

Whereas the public lands of the United States belong exclusively to the people of the United States, and whenever disposed of, the avails thereof ought to enure to the equal and common benefit of all the States; and whereas the present condition of this great national property furnishes a dangerous temptation to political ambition, enabling it to operate on public sentiment in certain portions of the country, by propositions and promises to cede to the States the public lands situated within their respective limits; and whereas all such propositions are in derogation of the trust under which this great public fund is held, and are calculated to subvert the confidence of the people in the justice and purity of the National Government; and whereas a subject of such magnitude and exciting interest, ought to receive the speedy action of Congress; be it therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to report to this House, on the earliest convenient day, a bill to secure to the several States their just rights and interests in the public lands, and providing that the proceeds of those lands, sold from time to time, shall be distributed among the States upon just and equitable principles.

On motion of Mr. MONTANYA,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of erecting a beacon light at the termination of the pier constructed by the New York and Erie railroad into the Hudson river, at Tappan bay, for the benefit of the navigation of said river.

Mr. DANA submitted the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That during the remainder of the present session of Congress, the daily meetings of this House shall commence at 11 o'clock a. m. until otherwise ordered.

Mr. KEMPSHALL submitted the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of fortifying the frontier on Lake Ontario, and especially of protection and defence of the harbor of Genesee and the city of Rochester.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Little Sodus, on Lake Ontario, and to report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. KEMBLE,

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be directed to inquire into the present state of the light house system of the United States, and to report such modifications, if any, as they may deem necessary to its greater efficiency and economy.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to inquire into the expediency of so modifying the laws for the collection of the revenue as to permit the entrance, for the benefit of drawback, of goods, wares, and merchandise, intended to be transported through the territories of the United States into the adjacent territories of foreign powers in amity with the United States.

On motion of Mr. GATES,

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing a pension to Jacob Jackson, of New York.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of fortifying the Niagara frontier, and especially of providing for the protection and defence of the harbor and city of Buffalo.

Mr. FLOYD submitted the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the expediency of erecting a monument in commemoration of the battle of Orishany, in the State of New York.

Mr. HOFFMAN submitted the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That all petitions, except those which may come within the rule in regard to petitions touching slavery, may be handed to the Clerk, and by him referred to the appropriate committees, under the directions of the members offering them.

Mr. MONROE submitted the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That five thousand additional copies of the report on the Smithsonian bequest be published for the use of the members of the House.

Mr. G. DAVIS submitted the following, which lies over.

Resolved, That the first section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States, by declaring "that the Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America," does not ordain and establish any Executive power; but the only purpose and effect of this language is, to vest such Executive powers as are created in other clauses of the Constitution in the President, except so far as those powers may be differently vested in whole or part by the Constitution.

Resolved, That the following language in the second section of the second article, viz: "he (the President) shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they may think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments. The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session," being the whole of so much of the Constitution as ordains and establishes, or invests any power of appointing to office, in all appointments, except to inferior offices provided for by a law of Congress, or to fill vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, the action of the Senate is as essential as that of the President.

Resolved, That the power of removal from office is not expressly ordained and established, or vested by the Constitution, but, from necessary implications, results and attaches to the appointing power instituted by the Constitution.

Resolved, That as a power of removal from office under the Constitution can be derived only by implication, and by reason and analogy, to attribute its existence and rightful exercise to one branch of the appointing power is equally illogical and unconstitutional, and produces in the President an augmentation of power dangerous to constitutional liberty; wherefore, the President cannot remove an officer, in whose appointment the concurrence of the Senate is required by the Constitution, unless the Senate, also, shall unite in the act of removal.

Resolved, That as the President is empowered by the Constitution to appoint to all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, and to commission such appointees until the expiration of the next session of the Senate, and is thus placed in possession of the whole appointing power pro tempore; the correlative and parallel power of removal from office temporarily, and operating for the same term of time, vests in the President, by implication and analogy; wherefore, during the recess of the Senate, the President has the power to remove or suspend such officers from their respective offices until the end of the next session of the Senate; and unless the Senate shall then have concurred in, the removal by the President ceases to operate, and the incumbent, by the operation of the Constitution, is restored to his office, and all its rights and privileges, as fully as though such suspension or temporary removal of him by the President had never been made.

Mr. HAND submitted the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of documents No. 118, of the 2d session of the 25th Congress (being the pension laws then in force) be reprinted for the use of the members of this House.

Mr. BOYD submitted the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, to examine into the condition of the Military Academy at West Point, with a view to the modification or repeal of such of the laws relative thereto, as propriety may suggest.

Mr. UNDERWOOD submitted the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill relinquishing and surrendering the Cumberland road to the States respectively through which it passes, in its present condition, upon such terms as the committee may deem expedient; and in order to enable the States through which the said Cumberland road passes to complete the same after it has been surrendered to them; and to do justice to the other States, by enabling them to share, in common with the States through which the Cumberland road passes, the funds which properly belong to all the States; the said committee is further instructed to report a bill providing for the distribution of the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands among all the States, in proportion to their Federal population respectively.

Mr. W. B. CARTER submitted the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the act of Congress for the benefit of the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army, passed the 7th June, 1832, so as to embrace those who were engaged in the wars of the United States, which occurred between the treaty of peace with Great Britain in 1793, and the treaty of Greenville, with the Indians, in 1795, and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. J. HASTINGS submitted the following, which lies over:

Whereas the Cadets of the Military Academy at West Point being educated gratuitously by the people of the United States, at an expense of above $2,000 each, justice and gratitude and sound policy, predicated upon those principles, demand that the orphan sons of those who have fought and bled and died in the service of their country, have the first claim upon our consideration for admission to the advantages of being educated at this national establishment; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of giving the sons of soldiers, whether of the regular army, or of the militia, or of volunteers, whether officers or privates, who have died or been killed in the service of the United States; and likewise the sons of sailors and marines, whether officers or privates, who have died or been killed in the same service, the preference over all other applicants for admission into the Academy or Military School at West Point.

Mr. STANLY submitted the following, which lies over:

Whereas, by the withholding of the fourth instalment by this Administration, the State of North Carolina is deprived of nearly half a million of dollars, which fourth instalment is part of the proceeds of the public lands; in order, therefore, that the said fourth instalment be paid to the State, notwithstanding the opposition of this Administration, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed, whenever there is sufficient money in the Treasury, to pay over the amount of said fourth instalment due to the State of North Carolina, to the proper authorities of said State, to aid said State in carrying on her public schools and internal improvements, if she choose so to dispose of it.

Mr. MONTGOMERY submitted the following, which lies over:

Whereas our glorious and successful struggle in the Revolutionary war for national independence was a joint common effort, in which the patriots in all the States in the Confederacy freely aided and contributed an equal proportionate share of their blood, suffering, and treasure; and whereas the people in all the States and Territories within the Union now enjoy equally and alike the inestimable blessings of liberty and happiness thereby gained; and whereas, with our national liberty, there was also gained, as a joint common stock fund, an immense property in public lands, more than twelve hundred millions of acres of which remain yet as a part of this joint common stock undisposed of, in which the whole people of these United States and Territories have, and hold, a good bona fide title and equitable and proportionate interest in fee simple, and which is hereafter to be disposed of by some mode to be by Congress pointed out; and whereas, in the year 1835, the last dollar of our national debt, as well that created by the war of the Revolution as that incurred by the war of 1812, and from all other sources whatsoever, was fully paid off, and all claims upon us, as a nation, for debts, were fully paid off, cancelled, and satisfied; and whereas ours was intended to be a cheap, plain, Republican Government; and inasmuch as the present Executive, in his late message to both branches of Congress, dated 24th December last, has not only recommended a strict and rigid economy, but has actually practised it himself, by reducing the annual estimates called for by him for the service of the year 1840, down to the sum of eighteen millions two hundred and eighty thousand six hundred dollars and fifty-five cents, that sum being less by over five millions of dollars—be it therefore

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, after the year 1840, the annual expenditure for the ordinary purposes of this Government in time of peace, shall not exceed the sum of fifteen millions of dollars, exclusive of the Post Office and trust funds.

2. Be it further resolved by the authority aforesaid, That when Congress shall, at any session, pass appropriations for the expenditures of any one year beyond those the actual expenditure in the year 1839 will amount to, (the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended great reductions in the annual expenditures, and gives a plan by which it can be done without injury to the public service, should Congress only lend their aid in carrying out these several recommendations proposed as above stated—the sum of $15,000,000,) it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to scale down the salary, pay, or compensation, paid to all and every officer in this Government, and also to scale down the amount appropriated to each object for which appropriations are made for that year, in equal proportions, until the expenditures shall come within the sum of fifteen millions of dollars for actual expenditure and the sum of three millions of dollars to meet outstanding drafts upon the Treasury, that may be in transitu.

3. Be it resolved by the authority aforesaid, That the public land belonging to the United States is a remainder of a joint common stock fund, to which all the people of the United States have an equal and just proportionate joint common stock interest.

4. Be it therefore resolved by the authority aforesaid, That the proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands, together with all other moneys that shall be in the Treasury of the United States at the expiration of each fiscal year after the year 1840, over and above the sum of fifteen millions of dollars for the ordinary expenditure, and the further sum of three millions to meet outstanding and unsettled drafts, and exclusive of the Post Office and trust funds, shall be equally divided by the Secretary of the Treasury among the States and Territories of this Union, according to their representation upon this floor, share and share alike, and paid over by the said Secretary to such person, or persons, as the Legislatures of the respective States and Territories shall or may authorize to receive and receipt for the same.

5. Be it further resolved, by the authority aforesaid, That Congress has no authority given it by the Constitution of the United States to levy any taxes, either direct or indirect, upon the people of the United States, for any other purpose than the immediate wants of the Government of the United States: that revenue raised or taxes imposed, either direct or indirect, upon the people, with a view to, or for, the object of creating a surplus fund in the Treasury of the United States, for distribution among the States, or for any other object or objects than the payment of the civil list, the army and navy of the United States, and such other incidental expenditures as are required for the legitimate objects of the General Government, are not authorized by the Constitution, and are therefore not within the power granted to Congress in the Constitution of the United States.

6. And be it further resolved, by the authority aforesaid, That so much of all laws fixing or defining the salaries or pay of all officers or other persons receiving pay from Government for services rendered, as comes within the provisions of any of the above resolutions, is hereby so modified as to conform to the above provisions.

Mr. CHITTENDEN submitted the following resolution, which was read for the information of the House:

Whereas in a communication made by the Clerk of this House to some of the members thereof, on the 21st instant, and published in the official organ of the Government in this city on the same day, members of this House are not only charged with gross violations of official duty, but with one of the highest crimes known to our laws; and whereas it is the imperious duty of the House to ascertain whether any of its members have, as charged in that communication, practised abuses in the name of said Clerk, either by the "forgery" of his name, or by obtaining it from him by means of "misrepresentation" in such a manner as to require the aid of said Clerk "in ferreting out the real responsible culprit, that he may be punished," and whether any members of this House have (as is also charged in said communication) sent packages through the mail, consisting of "blank franks," under the frank of "Hugh Garland, Clerk," with the intention "to cheat and defraud the revenue," that, in case it shall be ascertained that any member of this House has so far lost sight of the dignity of his station as to have been guilty of such a gross violation of duty and of the laws of this Government, he may receive that punishment which he justly merits; and that, in case the charges shall not be sustained, the authors of the base and infamous slanders may "at least be held up for the public scorn:" Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of three persons, be appointed to investigate the charges contained in the communication of said Clerk, whose duty it shall be to proceed with said examination, and report to this House with as little delay as possible; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Objection being made,

Mr. CHITTENDEN moved a suspension of the rules to let in the resolution; which motion prevailed—ayes 146, noes 16.

Mr. C. then said that he was not disposed to occupy the time of the House by debate on the subject, and therefore, he would move the previous question.

Mr. PETRIKIN said it was not in order to move the previous question, the resolution not having been read, and the question stated by the CHAIR.

The SPEAKER directed the Clerk to read the resolution; which was done; when,

Mr. CHITTENDEN again moved the previous question.

Mr. GALBRAITH asked if an amendment would be in order.

The SPEAKER said that the previous question being moved, amendments were not in order.

Mr. BYNUM. Are all amendments to the proposition cut off by moving the previous question?

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. BYNUM. Then I shall vote against it, I am in favor of the proposition, but am opposed to the preamble.

The second to the previous question was then carried—ayes 77, noes 54, and the previous question was carried without a division.

The main question then coming up,

Mr. BANKS moved a division of the question, so as to take it first on the resolution, and then on the preamble. He was opposed to the preamble, as Mr. Kendall had not made any such charges as were stated in it.

Mr. CLIFFORD hoped the resolution and preamble would be divided, and the question taken separately, because the preamble assur s us that the Postmaster General has made the charge that members of Congress have been guilty of the crime of forgery, which is not in accordance with the truth, as he understood it, and therefore he desired to vote against that part of the resolution, but did not object to the usual inquiry.

Mr. WISE submitted whether the resolution was separable from the preamble, without destroying the sense. The law of division was that every part divided should make a separate sense of itself.

The SPEAKER decided that the question was divisible, as the resolution contained a substantive proposition, and that the vote must, in conformity with parliamentary practice, be taken first on the resolution.

Mr. R. GARLAND called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and the question was taken on the resolution, and decided affirmatively—yeas 157, nays none.

The question then came up on the preamble, when

Mr. PETRIKIN called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and resulted in—yeas 91, nays 92.

So the preamble was rejected; when

Mr. WISE said that it was obvious to the House, that the resolution just adopted would be imperfect without some explanatory preamble. He hoped, therefore, the general consent of the House would be given to the preamble he was about to offer, which would affirm nothing, and commit no one, but merely explain the objects of the resolution. Mr. W. then submitted the following:

"Whereas the following correspondence, to wit."

This preamble only being in order by general consent,

Mr. PETRIKIN objected.

Mr. BANKS hoped the gentleman would withdraw the objection; he wished to see the resolution carried out in good faith.

Mr WISE then moved to suspend the rules to let in his preamble; which motion prevailing, Mr. W. submitted his preamble; when

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to amend it by inserting the words "communicated by the Clerk of this House."

Mr. WISE asked, Was the communication from the CLERK of the House?

The CLERK responded that it was.

Mr. WISE said he was then willing so to modify the preamble.

And, after some further conversation, the preamble was adopted, as follows:

Whereas the following correspondence has been communicated by the Clerk of the House to the members of the House, viz.

OFFICE OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES U. S.
March 18, 1840.

SIR: In consequence of the abuses practised under my name, as disclosed in the following correspondence, I am constrained, respectfully, to decline franking any package for members of Congress. Yours, etc.

H. A. GARLAND,
Clerk House of Representatives United States.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
March 11, 1840.

SIR: I deem it as much my duty to you as to the public, to apprise you of the unwarranted use made of your name, as disclosed in the enclosed copy of a letter from the postmaster at Hartford, Connecticut.

Whether your name in this case be a forgery, or whether you were induced to write it by any misrepresentation, I beg your aid in ferreting out the real responsible culprit, that he may be punished, or at least held up for the public scorn.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
AMOS KENDALL.

HUGH A. GARLAND, esq.
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

OFFICE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES U. S.
March 12, 1840.

SIR: I have received your letter of yesterday, enclosing one from the postmaster of Hartford, Connecticut, in which he states: "A gross abuse in relation to franking exists among the members of Congress; in addition to bushels of newspapers and speeches, daily received from our members of Congress, loading down the mails, there are large packages franked 'Hugh Garland, Clerk,' which packages consist of blank franks, and are intended to cheat and defraud the revenue."

If the packages, as he states, are endorsed "Hugh Garland, Clerk," they were certainly not sent by me, for I never sign my name in that way.

I am in the habit of franking packages for members of Congress, under a construction of the law of 1827, which I found prevailing when I came into office.

Under the law of 1825, section 27, the privilege of the Clerk of the House of Representatives was limited to two ounces. In 1827, it was extended so as to be only limited by a general law which prohibits postmasters from mailing any packages that shall exceed three pounds, except public documents.

My own impression is, that this privilege was intended for the official business of the Clerk's office, and not for the use of members of Congress.

But finding a different interpretation of the law prevailing, and learning that it had been so construed from the beginning, I have yielded to it. If, however, the Post Office Department does not concur in this interpretation of the law, I shall be pleased to know, for the information of the members of Congress, and for the regulation of my own conduct in future.

Yours respectfully,
H. A. GARLAND,
Clerk of the House of Representatives of United States.
Hon. AMOS KENDALL, Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
March 18, 1840.

SIR: I duly received your letter of the 12th, in reply to mine of the 11th instant, and have re-examined the laws having reference to the franking privilege of the Clerk of the House.

The Department is now, for the first time, apprised that the act of 1827, extending his franking privilege, had been construed to authorize him to frank packages for members of Congress.

The act of 1825 conferred on him, in common with members of Congress, the privilege of franking letters and packets not exceeding two ounces in weight, excepting only documents printed by order of either House, and so far from authorizing the one to frank for the other, imposed on every person possessing the franking privilege, who should frank "any letter or letters other than those written by himself, or by his order, on the business of his office," a penalty of ten dollars, from which no one but heads of Departments are in any such case exempt. The only change in the law made by the act of 1827, was to remove the limitation of two ounces on the Clerk's frank, so that he may now send and receive by mail, packets not exceeding three pounds in weight. There appears to be not the least ground for construing this act as authorizing him to frank letters or packets for members of Congress, whether they weigh more or less than two ounces; and if he now put his frank on "letters not written by himself, or by his order, on the business of his office," he is unquestionably as much liable to the penalty of ten dollars in each case, as if the act of 1827 had never passed.

I am gratified to find, that your view of the law does not differ from that entertained by the Department, and that you are ready, on ascertaining this coincidence, to abandon a practice entailed upon you by your predecessors. There seems to be something insatiable in "special privilege," which is ever striving to enlarge itself by all sorts of subterfuges and evasions. It is no less the duty of those connected with the legislation of the country, than with those entrusted with the execution of its laws, to give every grant of privilege which can only be enjoyed at the expense of the people, a strict construction, and confine its exercise to the narrowest bounds.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
AMOS KENDALL.

HUGH A. GARLAND, Esq.
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. KING offered the following, which was objected to, and lies over:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby directed to send to this House all his correspondence and the correspondence of any officer of his Department with any bank or banks on the subject of borrowing or raising money on sale and purchase of Treasury notes, or placing and receiving them on deposit; to inform this House what has been the actual cost of issuing Treasury notes under the several acts passed from October, 1837, to March, 1839, inclusive, authorizing the issue of Treasury notes; and to send to this House a statement of the interest paid and due on the several issues of Treasury notes from October, 1837, to 30th June, 1839, inclusive, and the terms on which they have been sold to any bank or banks, or to individuals, or placed on deposite.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said he did not object to the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia, and would take this occasion to state, upon information on which he could rely, that no compensation had at any time been paid by the Secretary, either to brokers or other persons, to convert Treasury notes into specie, and that Treasury notes had at no time been exchanged by him below their par value—that the course pursued by the Secretary had been to require that the specie should be deposited subject to his draft, before the Treasury notes were parted with by him.

Mr. KING thereupon moved a suspension of the rules, and asked the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 74, nays 74. [Not two-thirds.]

So the rules were not suspended.

On motion of Mr. C. MORRIS,

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the purchase of a sufficient quantity of land in the vicinity of the city of Washington for the purpose of erecting an establishment for the employment and support of the poor in said city, upon the principle adopted in Salem, Massachusetts, and other places.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a port of entry at Marietta, Ohio.

On motion of Mr. WELLER,

Resolved, That a select committee of three be appointed to inquire whether any of the officers of this House have, during the present session of Congress, furnished, at the expense of the Government, stationery to any person not entitled by law to the same, and ascertain and report the probable value thereof.

On motion of Mr. SAMUELS,

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing James Chambers a pension from an earlier period than the 15th of June, 1839.

On motion of Mr. WORTHINGTON,

Resolved, That the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Maryland in relation to the improvements of the harbor of Havre-de-Grace, passed at December session, 1838, and now on the files of the House, be referred to the Committee on Commerce; and also the resolutions of the Legislature of the same State, in relation to the establishment of a national foundry at or near Havre-de-Grace, now on the files of the House, be referred to the Select Committee on the Foundry.

On motion of Mr. STEENROD,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from the city of Wheeling, via Belen's Station, Soellnan's, Fish Creek, to Woodlands Post Office, Marshall county, Virginia.

On motion of Mr. P. F. THOMAS,

Resolved, That so much of the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy as relates to the claim for arrears of pension of Maria Harrison, only child of John Garde, deceased, late a sailing master on board the United States ship L'Insurgente, together with the proofs and other papers therewith submitted, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire how much, if any thing, is justly due from the United States to Adolphus Burghart, now deceased, who was a soldier or officer in the army of the United States a part of the time during the last war with Great Britain; or to his heirs or legal representatives, on account of arrearages of his pay or loss of his property while in the service as such soldier or officer.

Mr. TOLAND offered the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That four thousand copies of the report of the Select Committee on the Smithsonian Bequest be printed for the use of the members.

Mr. J. JOHNSON submitted the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed to keep an account of all stationery furnished to each member of the House, designating the portions furnished at the folding room, at the Capitol, and at other places; and that, hereafter, no articles of stationery be delivered, except upon personal application, or the written order of members.

On motion of Mr. PETRIKIN,

Resolved, That the select committee appointed to inquire whether any of the officers of this House, etc. are engaged, or in any way concerned, for the promotion of private claims against the Government, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of bringing in a bill prohibiting any clerk, or other officer of either House of Mongress, or any person holding any office or appointment under the Government of the United States, acting as agent nor attorney in the prosecution of any claim against the Government of the United States, during the pending of said claim before either House of Congress, or before the Departments, agents, or officers of the Government; and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. GALBRAITH,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to Mary Brookhouser, of Crawford county, Pennsylvania, for the services of her husband in the Revolutionary war.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire into the expediency of extending the jurisdiction of the United States courts over those parts of the Great Lakes within the boundaries of the United States; or of extending the jurisdiction of the State of Pennsylvania, by express terms, over that part of Lake Erie west of the New York line, east of the Ohio State line, and north of the territorial line, between the United States and the British Provinces of Canada; and also inquire into the expediency of establishing a branch of the United States court at Erie, in the State of Pennsylvania.

On motion of Mr. R. GARLAND,

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs inquire into the expediency and justice of paying to James Fenasye, late a private in the Marine Corps, the sum of $19 66, which he claims as prize money for assisting in the capture of certain Algerine vessels in the Mediterranean sea in the year 1815, and that the letters from the Secretary of the Navy and said Fenasye, hereto annexed, be referred to said committee.

On motion Mr. CHINN,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of rendering uniform the times, places, and manner of electing members of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. DOAN,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Scott to Locust Grove, and from Winchester to Locust Grove, in Adams county, Ohio.

On motion of Mr. WELLER,

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to the widow of Captain Philemon Gatewood, of the revenue service, who died from disease contracted in the service of the United States, whilst co-operating with the naval forces on the coast of Florida.

On motion of Mr. REID,

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire what provision is made for the prisoners for crime and for debt in this District; and also into the expediency of making new provision for their support.

On motion of Mr. McKAY,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be prepared and communicated to this House, at the commencement of the next session, all the opinions of the Attorney General and other officers connected with the Executive, which give construction to the public laws not of a temporary character.

On motion of Mr. TRIPLETT,

Resolved, That a select committee be raised to inquire and report whether any legislation be necessary to prescribe the form of returns which shall entitle persons claiming to be elected members of the House, to be admitted to seats and to participate in the organization thereof; and, if so, to report a bill prescribing the form of said return.

On motion of Mr. STEENROD,

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be required to inform this House, at as early a day as practicable, of the causes and the extent of the detention of the mail and of the irregularity of its conveyance between Wheeling, in the State of Virginia, and Bridgeport, in the State of Ohio, and also his opinion as to the best means for remedying the evil.

On motion of Mr. W. THOMPSON,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of furnishing to Mr. John W. Cochran such facilities as will enable him to construct and make a full experiment of the capabilities of his bomb cannon.

On motion of Mr. DAWSON,

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to examine into the present laws regulating the compensation of the volunteer soldiers for horses lost in the various campaigns against the Indians since 1830, and report what amendments are necessary to be made to secure fair and liberal justice to the unfortunate soldier who may have lost his property whilst in the service of his country.

On motion of Mr. SWENEY,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House all the information in the possession of the War Department relating to the progress, if any, that has been made by Government in effecting a treaty with the Wyandot tribe of Indians, for the purchase of their lands in Crawford county, Ohio, and their ultimate removal west of the Mississippi river; and whether a farther appropriation will not be required to effect that object.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN of Ohio,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the erection of soldiers' barracks at Cleveland, in the State of Ohio, and for the purchase of land necessary therefor.

On motion of Mr. BEIRNE,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Colesmouth, Kenawha county, Virginia, to Louisa, in the State of Kentucky.

On motion of Mr. DOAN,

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of a reissue of land warrants No. 1161, for 300 acres, issued on the 21st of February, 1826, in the name of James Erwin and other heirs at law of Joseph Erwin, which said warrant is lost.

On motion of Mr. HAND,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Elizabethtown to Moriah, in the State of New York.

On motion of Mr. EVANS,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to Margaret McIntire.

On motion of Mr. CLARK,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions do inquire into the propriety of granting a pension, in conformity to the provisions of the late act of Congress, to Esther Honeywell, widow of Matthias Honeywell, late a pensioner of the United States.

On motion of Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing the heirs of Dr. Samuel Kennedy interest on the five years' half pay granted to his heirs by an act of Congress passed in the year 1832.

On motion of Mr. CROCKETT,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Dresden, Tennessee, to Boysville, near the Kentucky line, in Weakly county, in said State.

On motion of Mr. BELL,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House, with as little delay as possible, copies of all orders and instructions issued from the Department to any officer of the army, or to any agent of the Government, requiring his interference with the Cherokee Indians in the formation of a Government for the regulation of their own internal affairs, not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, or with any existing treaty; also, copies of all instructions to any officer or agent of the Government, prescribing any particular form of government for the adoption of said Indians, and interdicting any other form.

Mr. TURNEY submitted the following, which was adopted:

Whereas the claims of the Tennessee volunteers for horses lost in the service of the United States in Florida, have been on file in the office of the Third Auditor of the Treasury for his adjudication and payment for some twenty-two months past; and whereas every exertion has been made by the said claimants to procure the action of said Auditor or said claims, in order that that they might obtain their just dues from the Government, but without effect; and whereas many of said claimants, with a large number of their fellow-citizens of Tennessee, have forwarded to the President of the United States their petitions, briefly stating the nature and character of their claims, the great delay, or, in fact, a total denial of justice by thus refusing to either allow or reject said claims, and thereby to enable the claimants, in the event of the rejection, to appeal to Congress for relief, and for this palpable dereliction of duty, praying his removal from office; and whereas said claimants having exhausted all the means in their power to coerce the action of said Auditor on said claims without effect; and whereas said claimants are petitioning the Congress of the United States for the passage of some law providing for the payment of said claims during the present session, which is likely to pass by without the final action of said Auditor in time for the claimants to apply for and obtain relief during the present session; therefore,

Resolved, That said Auditor forthwith dispose of said claims, by either allowing or rejecting them, and that the Secretary of War be instructed to superintend said Auditor, and see that he faithfully discharges the duties herein required.

Mr. TILLINGHAST called up the joint resolutions for examinations and surveys in Narragansett bay, Rhode Island, with a view to a naval depot, and for a report of the result from the Secretary of the Navy, with such views and opinions as he may deem important, which resolutions were laid over from the last resolution day, under the rule, and which he now moved to have printed and referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, stating that the gentleman on whose objection they were laid over, [Mr. BEATTY,] had consented to withdraw his objection.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected to the resolutions being called up for debate at this time, but not to the reference.

The resolutions were referred, and ordered to be printed, according to the motion.

CUMBERLAND ROAD, &c.

Mr. RARIDEN, pursuant to notice, asked leave to introduce a bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road through Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. Mr. R. said, in asking leave to introduce this bill, he did it in good faith, and hoped the vote would be given in the same spirit. There could (he said) be no propriety in granting the leave, if the same is only to result in the consumption of time by a protracted and exciting discussion, without the design finally of granting the appropriation; he therefore hoped the vote for leave would indicate the views of the House in regard to the appropriation proposed by the bill.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to lay the motion for leave on the table.

Mr. TURNEY (at fifteen minutes before five) moved an adjournment; which motion, by yeas 39, nays 83, was rejected.

Mr. DROMGOOLE then withdrew his motion to lay the motion for leave on the table, and objected to leave being "given."

And the motion for leave, giving rise to debate, was, under the decision of the CHAIR, ordered to lie over: when

Mr. RARIDEN moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of considering the motion for leave at this time.

Several motions for adjournment were made and withdrawn.

On the suggestion of Mr. CASEY,

Mr. RARIDEN appealed from the decision of the CHAIR, that the motion for leave, giving rise to debate, must lie over, and asked the previous question; which was seconded.

The main question was ordered, being on sustaining the decision of the CHAIR.

Pending which, on motion of Mr. TURNEY,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, March, 24, 1840.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a memorial of sundry proprietors and managers of American steam vessels, on the impolicy and injustice of certain enactments of the proposed law relating to steamboats; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRESTON presented a memorial of Hiram Powers, now a resident of the city of Florence, praying that works of art executed by Americans in foreign countries may be imported free of duty; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS presented a memorial of inhabitants of the town of Sippican, Massachusetts, praying that it may be made a port of entry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented the memorial of Benjamin Homans and Alfred B. Claxton, of the city of Washington, praying that they may be released from the penalty of a certain bond; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WHITE presented a memorial and joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, asking a further appropriation for the construction of a harbor at Michigan city; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented a memorial of the Legislature of Indiana, praying Congress to make an appropriation for the completion of the Cumberland Road; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which the subject was referred, reported a bill authorizing the inhabitants of section 10 south, range 1 east, to locate a half section of land for school purposes; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred

The memorial of John W. Thompson, and made unfavorable reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

The memorial of James Morgan,

Mr. H. from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Hugh Stewart; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

REFINED SUGAR DRAWBACK.

Mr. BENTON asked the indulgence of the Senate while he should correct an error into which he had fallen a few day ago in relation to the part which a late Senator of the United States had acted in the year 1828, in regard to the drawback on refined sugar: he spoke of Governor DICKERSON of New Jersey. He had represented that gentleman, when he opened the subject of the sugar and rum drawback a few days ago, as having made the proposition, and carried it through, to raise the drawback on refined sugars exported, from four cents to five cents a pound. On looking over the debate to which that proposition gave rise, which was in the month December, 1828, he (Mr. B.) found that it was Gen. SMITH, of Maryland, who made the proposition, and that Governor DICKERSON was one of those who opposed it, both by speaking against it and voting against it; arguing that the additional cent would be a bounty on the exportation of the article, and an encouragement to fraud, such as had taken place in the rum and snuff drawbacks. Time and events had proved these opinions were right; and the bill which he (Mr. B.) had brought in to reduce drawbacks was intended, among other things, to correct the erroneous legislation in relation to the sugar drawback, which commenced in the act of 1828, and was so greatly aggravated by the compromise act of 1833.

Mr. B. said it was with some pride that he looked back to his own course at the time this drawback was raised. He was the first Senator that spoke against it, and the only speaker against it on the first day, when he spoke three times. The next day Governor Dickerson and Mr. Tazewell spoke against it; but without being able to arrest the bill, which immediately passed, and now stands as another monument of the evils of hasty legislation. Although the whole subject was new to him, yet, Mr. B. said, the report of the debate shows that he saw the evils of the measure distinctly at that day, and was the first to denounce them; and that every evil came to pass precisely as he argued that it would. His argument was that this additional one cent per pound on the exportation of refined sugar, would be a bounty upon its exportation, and an addition to its price at home; that the manufacturers then had a monopoly of the home supply of refined sugar in consequence of the duty of twelve cents per pound on foreign refined sugar; that one cent a pound on such an article as sugar, where the dealer could increase his business so largely, though small in the detail was enormous in the aggregate; and must induce the refiners to make enormous exportations, to the injury of the Treasury and of the country;—to the Treasury on account of the great sums it would take from it—and to the country because they would have to pay an additional price equal to the additional drawback. Mr. B. quoted the words of his speech:

"The effect of the bill was to give one cent premium on every pound of sugar refined and reported. If the refiners could export at present, the additional bounty (for he could look upon it in no other light) of one cent, would cause immense shipments, or great and exorbitant profits be exacted." "While cut off from the competition of foreigners by a duty of twelve cents per pound on imported refined sugars, the refiner exorbitantly demands a drawback of five cents on the pound. This was a bold attempt at monopoly, and would soon operate as a direct bounty."

These were his objections to the act twelve years ago. He was answered by General Smith, that "if the bill passed, the whole average amount of the exportations would only be $1,007;"—"that 100,000 pounds might be exported in a year instead of 34,000." Mr. Woodbury, the present Secretary of the Treasury, concurred with General Smith in his general views, and stated the drawback that year to be about $2,000 (which would give about 50,000 pounds for the export,) and supposed that it might rise to the amount supposed by General Smith. These were the opinions at the time; and now for the results. A table received from the Register of the Treasury (Major Smith) in answer to an application to him, shows that the drawback on the export of these refined sugars from 1828, when the drawback was raised, til 1833, when the compromise act was passed, was:

In 1828	$2,045	In 1831	63,688
1829	45,092	1832	42,840
1830	84,250

Such was the enormous and instant increase!

This table shows that the objections to ths bill were well taken, and have been justified by the event. The drawback was raised in December, 1828; the next year the amount paid rose from $2,000 to $45,000; the year after to $84,000; and in the four years the amount paid for this drawback was about $280,000; being upwards of double the amount paid on that head from the foundation of the Government up to the year 1828. The whole amount paid for these drawbacks from 1789 to 1828 was about $130,000; the fact of more than doubling this amount in four years after 1828, proves that the additional cent on the drawback was, what it had been charged to be, a premium out of the Treasury, and a naked bounty upon exportation." This was the effect under the act of 1828; and bad enough it was; but then came the compromise act to reduce the duty on raw sugar, with biennial reductions, until it will go down to less than one cent per pound, while the drawback remains at five! The consequence of this new error is another excessive augmentation of the export of refined sugars, and the drawback payable upon them. In 1839, this export had actually arrived at upwards of five millions of pounds per annum, drawing above $250,000 out of the Treasury in a single year! and this still on the increase; for the great reductions of duty, and the greatest temptations to export, are yet to come: they come in 1841 and 1842, and thereafter until the act of 1833 is amended.

Mr. B. then showed the annual increase of drawback on refined sugar, under the compromise act, to be, after it began to operate, in 1835:

For 1835,	$42,929	For 1838,	$145,494
1836,	83,768	1839,	251,301
1837,	100,642

This, he said, was the effect of the act for five years, and the five during which its operation was less beneficial to the exporter than it would be hereafter. Proceeding in the same ratio of increase, in three or four years more, when the sugar duty comes down to 20 per cent. on the value, the fact would be that the whole revenue from sugar would be insufficient to pay the drawback! At present, the drawback is more than twice too much: it is one-fifth too much under the act of 1828; and it is made double too much by the operation of the compromise act. During the last year alone, the two acts together gave the sugar refiners about $150,000 more than they ought to have received. After 1842, if these acts are not altered, these refiners will receive about five times as much as they would be entitled to under a fair adjustment of the drawback, and, consequently, would increase their exportations until the whole sugar revenue would be absorbed in the payment of their drawback! He (Mr. B.) in his previous opening speech, had supposed that the drawback already absorbed the whole sugar revenue; but that was an error—an error as to time only; for, after 1842, the whole of this revenue might actually be absorbed in that way. The molasses and salt revenue, he had shown, were to be absorbed in the same way, unless prevented by timely legislation.

Mr. B. said it had always been considered a dangerous thing to allow a drawback in a case where an article had passed out of the hands of the collector, or had broken bulk, or had changed its form. Both Mr. Tazewell and Mr. Dickerson spoke of this danger in 1828, and instanced the famous case of the snuff drawback in 1798; and Mr. Tazewell showed the sugar drawback to be a remnant of the old excise on sugar in 1794, and again during the late war. By this excise, the sugar refiners paid 4 cents a pound to the Treasury on all the sugar refined by them; and if they exported any part which had paid this 4 cents, they drew it back. At the same time, to enable them to pay this excise, and to make a better source of revenue, Congress gave them a monopoly of the home market for refined sugars, by putting a prohibitory duty of 12 cents on the pound on imported refined sugars. This was the origin of the sugar drawback. The excise had long since ceased; but its two children, the monopoly and the drawback, survived; and this drawback was increased one-fifth in 1828, and is now doubled under the act of 1833, and will soon be quadrupled, if that act is not altered.

Mr. B. said his only object this morning was to do justice to a former member of this body, Mr. Dickerson, whom he had placed on the wrong side of a most important question; and to shew that that gentleman, and Mr. Tazewell, and he might add himself, (for he was the first among them to oppose the increased drawback of 1828) were all right in their opposition to that measure, and in their predictions of its effects in stimulating exportations of refined sugar, and keeping up the price at home, and draining large sums unduly from the Treasury.

The Senate then went into Executive session;

And afterwards adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
TUESDAY, March 24, 1840.

Mr. RARIDEN moved a supension of the rules, for the purpose of continuing the call of the States for resolutions.

Mr. RAMSEY demanded the yeas and nays, which were subsequently ordered.

Mr. BANKS moved a call of the House.

Mr. DAVIES demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The motion for a call was then decided in the negative.

The question on suspending the rules was then taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 47, nays 83.

The SPEAKER then announced the business before the House to be the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GARLAND] to the motion to print the report of the committee on the New Jersey elections—the amendment being to discharge the committee from the further consideration of certain testimony.

Mr. BOTTS, who was entitled to the floor, resumed, in continuation, his remarks, where he left off on Saturday morning, and continued speaking until the expiration of the morning hour, when

The Senate bills on the SPEAKER's table were then taken up, read twice, and committed; after which,

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia,

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. DAWSON in the Chair—and resumed the consideration of the Treasury note bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL, who was entitled to the floor, said he wa as anxious to supply the Government with funds as any other person, but he objected to the ground assumed as a cause for the issue. It was asked only for a temporary purpose—to pay out in anticipation of receipts from revenues during the year. Such had been the excuse for former issues, and such would be the pretext for the future. He took exception, because he believed there was a permanent deficit. He objected to the bill in its present form, because he believed it would empower the Secretary to issue from ten to sixty millions in the year, if he deemed it necessary, instead of five millions. He was understood to be opposed to it, also, because he believed it to be connected with another system the Sub-Treasury system. He argued at some length, and cited the authority of Crawford, Dallas, and others, to show that the issue of Treasury notes, as bills of credit, were unconstitutional; and adverted to the Madison papers, giving the debates of the convention which formed the Constitution, by which he showed that the authority was expressly forbidden to the Government by that convention. If any such power at all existed, it was by implication. He was in favor of a loan, because the power in the Constitution was specific and express; and opposed to the issue of these notes, because it was expressly denied, if they be issued in the form of a bill of credit. He was not in favor of a national debt, though he did not believe it such a great curse as some gentlemen seemed to think. The debt incurred to carry on the last war had, on the other hand, proved rather a blessing than otherwise, when he considered the termination of it. He was confident that the credit of the Government was such that it could borrow any amount necessary, and pay it at its own option; and contended that by thus borrowing from abroad, it would be beneficial to the business operations of the country; and, on the other hand, that if the issue of the notes be resorted to, it would cripple the business—for the reason that the Government, by its superior credit, could possess itself of the means of the banks—would absorb all the means by which those institutions usually afford facilities to the merchants to carry on their operations. He then went into an argument to show that these notes were as much a currency as State bonds, bank paper, and post notes, and that they would tend to increase all difficulties of which a portion of the country now complained—that there was too much paper, and too little specie. He believed, with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that the issue of notes would help the banks. These institutions, in consequence of the doubt hanging over the credit of the trading community, would invest the funds in these notes, and would take just so much from the merchants. If the money be borrowed on loan from abroad, it would be beneficial both to the banks and to the merchants. The issue of these notes was a part of the plan to carry out the gold and silver system—a plan that could not be accomplished without it. He belived it would increase the power of the Executive over the money system of the country, which was more dangerous than the bank money power of which there were so loud complaints and so many apprehensions. He also argued to show that, under the operations of the Bank of the United States, the exchanges and currency were in much better condition than under any other system. He contended that, under an Independent Treasury, or a hard money system, the Government never would have been able to pay off its national debt, or assumed the stand it now occupies among the nations of the earth. Mr. T. having concluded after a long argument,

Mr. EVANS obtained the floor, and was about proceeding in his remarks on the bill, but yielded to

Mr. BLACK, who said this was the day on which it was made the special duty of the Select Committee on Printing to make a report; and, with that view, he would move that the committee rise to enable him to make that report.

The question on rising was taken by tellers, [Messrs. HUBBARD and WELLER acting as such,] and decided in the negative—ayes 47, noes 78.

Mr. EVANS resumed. He regretted that the subject of the finances of the Government had excited so little attention. Since the subject of the disordered finances had been under consideration, the committee had with difficulty kept a quorum. He stated in advance, that if he voted for this bill at all, it would be with great reluctance, and because of the absolute necessity of its passage to secure the credit of the Government. It had been said by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that this bill was merely intended as a temporary arrangement, to meet the irregularities in the receipts and disbursements—to anticipate at the present time the receipts of the present year, which would be adequate to meet within that time the wants of the Government. He did not look upon it as a mere anticipation of means coming into the Treasury during the year, but believed there was a permanent deficit in the Treasury; and thought it the duty of the chairman of the Ways and Means and the Secretary of the Treasury, so to state to the country, that a proper and permanent remedy might be applied. He then examined the fluctuations in the receipts and expenditures of former years, to show that there was nothing peculiar in the condition of this year, in that respect, which rendered it necessary now, any more than at that time, to make an issue of notes to equalize the receipts and disbursements, except indeed the two millions of Treasury notes which fell due on the first quarter of this year. The measure—the issue of these notes—stood on a stranger ground than on that of immediate present necessity. It could not be defended on the ground of fluctation in the revenues—on the ground of mere anticipation of the receipts. There was a higher ground—a permanent deficiency in the revenues of the country. He then went into an examination of the question of revenues in expectation, and contended that, by reduction in the tariff, and other causes, the revenue of this year would not approach any where near that of the last and previous years. To prove that there was a permanent deficit in the Treasury, and that the revenues of the Government for the last three years have not been sufficient to meet the disbursements, he adverted to the fact that the five millions which were authorized to be kept in the Treasury, to meet sudden emergencies, (and which, by some inadvertence, was increased to upwards of six millions,) the amounts falling due from the suspended bonds of the merchants, and the sale of the United States Bank bonds, and other sources, amounting to twenty-four millions, and not received during that time from the revenues, had all been expended, to meet the wants of the Government, within the past three years: thus showing an expenditure of eight millions more in each year, for the last three years, than was received from revenues. From this state of things, he believed there was a permanent deficit, and that the receipts of this year will not be sufficient to meet the expenditures. Another reason which induced him to believe that the revenue would not be as great as was anticipated by by the Secretary, was the fact, that the packets from Liverpool, which usually came in full, are now arriving in New York daily, almost empty; and instead of now bringing goods dutiable, they are carrying away goods, which the merchants had in store, and for which there was no sale, and thus receiving drawbacks, and causing another demand upon the Treasury not anticipated. Mr. E. contended that a loan could be easily effected; there was money enough, but no demand; currency enough, but there was a stagnation of all business; every thing was falling; manufactures stopping; in fact every thing which constituted the business of the country was staggering. All these causes combined to cut off the revenues of the country. He believed, however, there was a healthy action going on, though it was a severe one. The nation was now exporting largely; but all this went to pay the debts abroad, which was certainly very desirable; but the vessels carrying out did not bring any thing back to contribute towards the receipts from revenues. Mr. E was confident that there was a permanent deficit in the Treasury, and thought the Secretary of the Treasury should have made a faithful exposition of the condition of the finances, instead of concealing and covering it up. He was of the opinion that the Secretary had underrated, in his estimates, the probable expenditures of the Government for the year; and cited many objects which he deemed absolutely necessary, and which he thought might pass this session, not included in those estimates.

Mr. E. without concluding, yielded the floor to

Mr. UNDERWOOD, who moved that the committee rise;

Which question was taken by tellers, (Messrs JONES of Virginia, and DAVIS, acting as such,) who reported that there were ayes 60, noes 90. So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. EVANS resumed, and said he was not speaking to delay the passage of the bill, or worry the patience of the House. He then went on to show the depressed condition of the business of the country; and said that he had just been informed that a letter had been received from New York, which gives the amount of duties paid on cargoes of four ships, compared with that of last year in same vessels, showing that the duties on the said cargoes are but one-seventh as great as last year.

If he believed with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that the measure was only a temporary one, that the relief here sought was only to anticipate the means that were to come into the Treasury within the year, he would not hesitate to give it his support: believing, as he did, that this deficiency was permanent, and that it would increase; and being desirous to see some permanent provision made, he should much prefer some other measure. The honorable chairman tells the House that there was necessity for immediate relief; that we have not time to turn about and seek other modes of relief; and he agreed with him. He was constrained to say that he believed this measure stands between Government and actual bankruptcy: nay, he believed that there were at that moment protested drafts now in the Treasury. Under these circumstances, much as he would have preferred some other mode of relief, he should be reluctantly compelled to give it his vote.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina followed in opposition to the bill, contending that it was a violation of the Constitution of the Government to issue Treasury notes. He was understood to be in favor of a direct loan. He reviewed the policy of the past and present Administrations in relation to the currency, and attributed all the present embarrassments of the business of the country to that cause. He censured the course of the Government in relation to the Florida war, and was in favor of sending a much larger force there, which he believed was the only means by which that war could be successfully terminated. He also examined some of the provisions of the Sub-Treasury bill, and denounced that measure as one fraught with many evils—as being very injurious to the best interests of the country. Mr. T. before concluding, yielded the floor to

Mr. MONROE, who moved that the committee rise; and,

Tellers having been called for on that motion, Messrs. RAMSAY and HUBBARD were appointed as such, who reported that there were—ayes 60, noes 93.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. THOMPSON then resumed, and concluded, his remarks n opposition to the principles of the bill.

Mr. NISBET then obtained the floor, and addressed the House at some length in favor of the bill. He considered the issue of Treasury notes, as provided for in the bill, to be in effect the borrowing of money, and therefore constitutional. But to take away even the semblance of bills of credit, he concluded by offering an amendment, as follows:

"Provided, that the notes proposed to be issued in virtue of this act shall bear interest of not less than two, nor more than six, per cent. at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the advice of the President."

Mr. BIDDLE then obtained the floor, but gave way to

Mr. HABERSHAM, who offered an amendment, to come in the second section, as follows:

"Which said notes shall be negotiable by endorsement only, and subject to the same rules and restrictions as inland bills of exchange, but without liability of endorsers."

Mr. BIDDLE said his position as a dissenting member of the Committee of Ways and Means rendered it almost absolutely necessary to say something on this bill. He did not believe there was sufficient time now to discuss any of the topics in the measure, as fully as he could have wished, and as he would have done if he had obtained the floor at an earlier day. The President says he wants the money. He would much rather, at the end of the year, find himself the dupe of the President than peril the credit of the Government by interposing opposition to the passage of the bill. He then commented at length on the annual message of the President, with a view to show that the possible contingencies which he said might render it necessary to issue Treasury notes, had not occurred. He examined the bill in all its constitutional bearings, and referred to the proceedings of the convention which formed the Constitution, and to the opinions of ex-President Jackson and others, in support of his argument that the issue of Treasury notes could only be defended as an act of extreme emergency, on account of its dangerous tendencies. He was understood to be in favor of a direct loan, which, he said, could be easily effected, as there was a vast deal of capital lying idle in the city of New York, in consequence of the loss of confidence in the community, and which was seeking for safe investments.

The question was then taken on Mr. NISBET's amendment, and decided in the negative.

Mr. HABERSHAM then addressed the House in support of his amendment. He said he was induced to offer it, because it had been stated by the chairman that these notes were not intended to be circulated as money. If it was not so intended, there could be certainly no objection to the amendment. But if this amendment was not admitted, and the notes were intended to circulate, his colleague [Mr. NISBET,] must agree with him that the bill was unconstitutional. He believed these notes were bills of credit within the meaning of the Constitution, and they would circulate as money without the restriction in his amendment. During the late war, similar notes circulated as money, and depreciated about twenty-five per cent. like the continental money, notwithstanding they bore interest. The notes, as proposed to be issued, will circulate as money, and as such came within the description denominated bills of credit. He cited decisions of the United States courts in several instances to sustain his opinion. His object was to take away the power to circulate these notes as money, and give them the character of prommissory notes or bills of exchange. Mr. H. addressed the House at some length in support of his amendment. After which,

Mr. WARREN spoke at considerable length, and with much earnestness, in opposition to the bill, opposing it both on the grounds of expediency and constitutionality, and, in the course of his remarks, commenting on the Sub Treasury bill, the Bank of the United States, the deposite banks, etc.

Mr. BARNARD then rose, and after some remarks on the course the debate had taken, asked the House to indulge him, by postponing the further consideration of the subject till to-morrow. He wished to address the House in favor of his amendment, but was physically unable to proceed this evening. [Cries of question, question, were heard.] Mr. B. said that gentlemen could not put him down by cries of question, question, and he now gave them notice, if interruptions of this kind were persisted in, he would continue on the floor so long as he was able to stand. Mr. B. then moved that the committee rise.

Tellers were called for, and Messrs. DROMGOOLE and WELLER were chosen, when the question was taken, and the tellers reported ayes 53, noes 90.

Mr. BARNARD, after a few remarks, again moved that the committee rise.

Tellers were called for, and Messrs. HOLLEMAN and JAMES were chosen; who, on counting the votes passing between them, reported ayes 1[illegible], noes 85, the Whig members generally, sub silentio, refusing to vote.

A quorum not having voted in consequence,

Mr. DROMGOOLE said that he was under an impression that there was a quorum present; and he would therefore inquire if it was in order to have a count of the members who were within the bar. He maintained that the committee could sit and wait for the arrival of a quorum, if one was not present; but he wished the fact to be ascertained by an actual count.

The CHAIR [Mr. DAWSON] said, that as a quorum had not voted, the committee must rise, and report that fact to the House. The yeas and nays could not be taken in committee, and there was no way of ascertaining whether a quorum was present, but by an actual count.

Mr. CRARY said the fact would be ascertained on the very next question, and that was on a motion for the committee to rise and report the want of a quorum.

Mr. HOFFMAN contended that in conformity with the practice of the House and with parliamentary usage, no motion is necessary, but that the committee must of necessity rise and report the fact to the House when there is not a quorum voting.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said the question resolved itself into this: whether the fact of a quorum's not voting was conclusive evidence that a quorum was not present.

Mr. MONROE would like to know how the gentleman could arrive at the fact that there was a quorum present but by the votes taken.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. It can be ascertained by an actual count of the members present.

The CHAIR was of opinion that in the event of a quorum not voting, the committee must rise and report the fact to the House. This was in conformity with the former practice of the House.

Mr. BANKS observed that the rule, as laid down by the Manual, (which was adopted as the rules of the House,) to direct the rising of the Committee of the Whole, was, that the question should be put on a motion that the committee rise. Now, he presumed that the chairman could not put the question on his own motion, but that the question must be put on the motion of a member. He was willing to admit that a practice had prevailed here in direct opposition to this rule; but the former Speaker informed him that he was correct in this view of the subject, and that he had only given contrary decisions in conformity with the practice of the House. It was evident that there was a quorum present, though there was not a quorum voting.

Mr. HOLLEMAN observed that it was impossible to reconcile their minds to the fact that there was not a quorum present, when they looked round, and saw the number of gentlemen within the bar. We all know, said he, how this state of things has arisen. Gentlemen have refused to vote, and thus there appears to be no quorum.

Mr. WELLER remarked that it must be well known to every man in the House, that there was a quorum present; that so soon as the chairman commenced the count, the Whig members generally left their seats, and withdrew from the bar, in order that a quorum might not be found, and the House compelled to adjourn, and thus postpone the passage of the bill. The chairman could not of course count those who had withdrawn from the bar, but he desired that the country should know the trick resorted to by Whig gentlemen here to prevent the presence of a quorum.

The committee then (under the decision of the CHAIR) rose, and reported the fact to the House, that there was not a quorum voting.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved a call of the House.

Mr. RICE GARLAND moved an adjournment; and

Mr. SMITH of Maine called for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and, on taking the question, resulted in—yeas 31, nays 95.

The House refusing to adjourn, and a quorum voting,

The SPEAKER informed the House that a quorum was present; and the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the whole, Mr. DAWSON of Georgia in the chair.

Mr. BARNARD again moved that the committee rise.

Mr. CLIFFORD inquired whether the motion was in order, there having been no business transacted in the committee since the last motion for it to rise.

The CHAIR decided that the motion was in order, and the question was take and decided in the negative—ayes 11, noes 92, the Whig members, generally, refusing to vote.

A quorum not having voted—

Mr. KEIM asked for an actual count of the committee. This was, he thought, complete children's play. There was manifestly a quorum present.

Mr. PROFFIT said, then, if there is children's play, there can be a little man's play too.

The CHAIR having decided that it was his duty to rise and report the fact that there was no quorum, without the authority of the committee,

Mr. PETRIKIN raised the point of order that he had a right to demand a count of the members present, and it was the duty of the CHAIR to make the count; and on the decision of the CHAIR against him, appealed from the decision.

Mr. CURTIS observed that, as there was no quorum, an appeal could not be in order.

Mr. HOLMES said that was begging the question. What was the question before the House? Whether or not there was a quorum present; and the gentleman from New York said that that question could not be taken, because there was no quorum. That was the very petitio principii of the whole question.

Mr. CURTIS explained.

Mr. HOLMES said he allowed the gentleman to explain, and his explanation amounted to the same thing that he had before advanced. Are we, said Mr. H. by this kind of ruse de guerre to be deprived of our rights, by gentlemen's refusing to pass between the tellers? What was the decision of the CHAIR? It was, that he was obliged to rise and report the fact to the House, that a quorum had not voted; an appeal was taken, and the question was, whether the decision of the CHAIR shall stand. On this the gentleman from New York said the appeal was not in order, because there was no quorum. For the House to sustain this position would be such an absurdity as to subject them to the ridicule of the whole country.

Mr. VANDERPOEL read the 150th rule as applicable to the question.

Mr. ANDREWS rose to a point of order, and inquired whether the question was debatable?

The CHAIR said that an appeal was debatable.

Mr. VANDERPOEL thought it very important that this question should be settled. The idea was not to be tolerated that the Committee of the Whole was as powerless as gentlemen seemed to think. When we see, said Mr. V. a majority sitting round us, can it be pretended that the CHAIR has not a right to ascertain that majority by a count? No gentleman could rise in his place and say that there was not a quorum present, when only a moment or two age it was clearly ascertained that there was one? There were at least one hundred and sixty members on the floor when the last vote was taken. Mr. V. then read the 150th rule of the House.

The CHAIR then said that he was called upon by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to ascertain, by an actual count of the members within the bar, whether there was a quorum present. He had ascertained that, under a former decesion of the House, he had the power to count; but he would observe, that when he should do so, and announce the result, it was very questionable whether the members could be compelled to vote. The CHAIR would then proceed to ascertain, by count, if there was a quorum within the bar.

Mr. RICE GARLAND. Then we can get outside of the bar; and Mr. GARLAND walked out, followed by Messrs. BARNARD, FILLMORE, SMITH of Connecticut, and PROFFIT; and the Whigs generally on the left of the SPEAKER retreated to the outside of the bar—several voices crying, "run boys, run!"

The CHAIR having counted, announced that there were 107 members within the bar.

Mr. WELLER. A number of gentlemen have left the bar, to avoid being counted. I wish that fact to be understood throughout the country. [These were Whigs.]

The CHAIRMAN then descended from the chair, and announced to the House that there was not a quorum present.

Mr. CRAIG moved a call of the House.

Mr. PROFFIT moved that the House adjourn; on which motion,

Mr WELLER called for the yeas and nays; and the call having been seconded, the question was taken, and resulted—yeas 25, nays 98.

Previous to the result being announced from the CHAIR,

Mr. VANDERPOEL announced the fact that the member from Massachusetts, Mr. ADAMS, who was in his seat, had refused to vote, and moved that he be called on to vote.

The CHAIR said that the motion was not now in order, the House having, on a former occasion, decided that a motion of this kind could not be made pending the taking of a vote, and the announciation of the result.

The SPEAKER said that a quorum being present, the House would again resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Treasury note bill.

The House having accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole,

Mr. BARNARD, without proceeding in his remarks, again moved that the committee rise.

Tellers were called for, and Messrs. GRAVES and JAMESON were appointed; who, on counting the voters passing between them, reported ayes 26, noes 67.

[The Whigs, sub silentio, refused to vote.]

A quorum not voting, the committee rose and reported the fact to the House.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved a call of the House.

Mr. BARNARD moved an adjournment.

Mr. WELLER called for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn, which having been ordered, the question was taken, and resulted—yeas 27, nays 90.

On this question many Whigs, and Mr. BARNARD, who moved the adjournment, did not vote.

The House having refused to adjourn, and it being ascertained by the vote just taken that there was a quorum present,

The House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, and took up the Treasury note bill, Mr. DAWSON of Georgia in the chair.

And again finding itself without a quorum, reported the fact to the House; when

Mr. DUNCAN moved a call of the House.

And the yeas and nays having been ordered, the question was taken, and resulted—yeas 91, nays 21.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania moved that the House adourn.

Mr. WELLER called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. COOPER then withdrew his motion.

Mr. PROFFIT renewed it.

Mr. PETRIKIN called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAWSON hoped the call of the House would not be proceeded in. He thought no good could arise from continuing this state of things. It was now one o'clock, and the members were all perfectly exhausted and required rest.

Mr. COOPER of Ga. expressed the hope that the House would adjourn; he was in the habit of rising at five o'clock in the morning and would agree to meet the House at that hour, but he now required some sleep.

The question was then taken on Mr. PROFFITT's motion to adjourn, and decided in the negative—yeas 23, nays 92.

Mr. PETRIKEN here asked if it was in order to call on gentlemen to vote who were in their seats and declined voting. He announced the fact that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. SLADE] was in his seat when his name was called, and that he declined voting.

The SPEAKER replied that, under a former decision of the House, a gentleman could not be called on to vote while the vote was being taken, and before the announcement of the result. After the result was announced, it was too late to call on him.

Mr. PETRIKIN appealed from the decision of the CHAIR, but withdrew his appeal, at the request of his friends.

The call of the House was then proceeded with; when it was ascertained that 135 gentlemen answered to their names.

Mr. CASEY observed that it was now one o'clock, and that it was obvious that the House could not force the attendance of its members, so as to act on the bill to-night; and it did seem to him that the business of the country would be better proceeded with by adjourning, and commencing again with the business to-morrow, after being refreshed by rest. Mr. C. then moved that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. DUNCAN called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. McKAY proposed a compromise to gentlemen. He would move that, by general understanding, the committee be discharged from all further consideration, and that until six o'clock to-morrow be allowed for discussion in the House.

Mr. ANDREWS and Mr. PROFFIT objected, and the question on the motion was not put.

Mr. CASEY withdrew his motion, and, during great disorder and confusion, the call of the absent members was proceeded with; after which,

The SPEAKER announced that 146 members had answered to their names, and then directed the doors to be closed.

Mr. DAWSON observed that it must be evident to the House that nothing could be accomplished by proceeding with the call of the House. By the operation, said he, we are going through with now, it will take till daylight to get the absent members here, and receive their excuses. Those who were to be brought in by the Sergeant-at-Arms would not be brought in till daylight, and, he said, we are to be compelled to sit here till they come. Mr. D. thought the whole proceeding was wrong, and would be glad of some way of getting rid of it.

Mr. BEATTY would ask the gentleman whose fault it was that they were kept here all the night. It was the fault of the Opposition members who so often refused to vote in order to prevent a quorum.

The absentees were again called over, when Mr. ANDERSON of Kentucky was excused on account of indisposition.

Mr. FILLMORE here said, that he understood that his colleague [Mr. BARNARD] was willing that the bill should be reported to the House provided there was an understanding that the previous question should not be called. Mr. F. then moved to suspend further proceedings under the call.

Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; when

Mr. FILLMORE withdrew his motion.

Mr. HOLMES asked leave to make an appeal to the House—[Great noise and confusion.]

Mr. MONROE objected. He was refused the privilege of making an explanation himself.

Mr. HILLEN moved that Mr. CARROLL be excused on account of indisposition.

Messrs. PROFFIT and ANDREWS called for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered, and

Mr. CARROLL was excused without a division.

Mr. HOLMES again rose and attempted to address the House—but objections being made by several, he sat down.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD,

Mr. CHAPMAN was excused on account of indisposition.

On several motions, Messrs. COLQUITT of Georgia, CRANSTON of Rhode Island, ELY of Pennsylvania, and EVERETT and GRANGER, were excused.

Mr. GRAVES moved to excuse Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina; but the House refused to excuse him.

Mr. STANLY offered the following resolution, which was read for information, as follows:

Whereas the calls of the House heretofore have cost the Government several hundreds of dollars, by excusing those gentlemen who were summoned by the Sergeant-at-Arms: Therefore,

Resolved, That those members who shall be summoned to attend by the Sergeant-at-arms, shall pay the fees due said officer.

The resolution not being in order but by general consent, and Mr. DAWSON and others objecting, no question was put on it.

Mr. HOFFMAN moved to suspend further proceedings under the call; and the question was taken by tellers, [Messrs. CROSS and WELLER,] who reported ayes 23, noes 79.

A member here moved that the absentees be sent for; which was agreed to.

Mr. DAWSON appealed to the House to reconsider that vote. It was now near daylight.

The CHAIR said that the motion must come from some gentleman who voted with the majority.

Mr. STANLY again offered his resolution; but

Mr. DAWSON objected, and the question was not put on the motion.

Mr. SLADE moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. PETRIKIN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and the question was taken and decided in the negative—yeas 25, nays 98.

Mr. GRAVES moved that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said he would agree to dispense with further proceedings under the call, provided there was a quorum present who would agreed to remain here and do the business of the country.

Mr. STANLY called for the yeas and nays on Mr. GRAVES's motion, which being ordered, resulted—yeas 27, nays 91.

Mr. ADAMS being one of those present, and not voting,

Mr. DAWSON moved that Mr. ADAMS be compelled to vote.

No question being put on this motion,

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio offered a resolution that JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, a member of this House, and now in his seat, for refusing to vote, when called on, on the several questions put this evening, and particularly the last, be now required to answer to his name.

The SPEAKER said that under a former decision of the House, the resolution was not in order.

Mr. JAMES moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. WELLER called for the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, resulted in yeas 27, nays 88.

Mr. CRARY here offered a resolution similar to that of Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio, requiring Mr. ADAMS to vote—but

The SPEAKER ruled it to be out of order.

Mr. CURTIS moved that when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet at twelve o'clock noon; which motion was decided in the negative without a division.

Mr. BEATTY said he would like to know of the CHAIR at what time it would be in order to enforce the rules of the House requiring members present to vote.

The SPEAKER said that, by a former decision of the House, a motion to require a member to vote could not be received while the vote was being taken, and before the announcement of the result to the House After the result was announced the question was decided, and it was too late then to require a member to vote.

Mr. LEWIS. The House would now see the predicament in which it was placed by reversing a just decision of the SPEAKER some days since.

Mr. PROFFIT moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. DROMGOOLE inquired if a motion to adjourn was in order while the process of compelling the attendance of absent members was going on. He could not consent to adjourn while the doors were closed.

Mr. PROFFIT. Then go out of the window.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. I do not choose to go out in that way.

The SPEAKER decided that the motion to adjourn was in order.

Mr. CRARY appealed from the decision of the CHAIR, when

Mr. PROFFIT withdrew his motion to adjourn.

After a short interval,

Mr. PROFFIT again moved an adjournment; and

Mr. WELLER called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. CASEY appealed to the gentleman to withdraw the motion. The Sergeant-at-Arms, he understood, was in attendance with several absent members.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 16, nays 80.

The SPEAKER announced that the Sergeant-at Arms was in attendance, and had presented a list of gentlemen who were in his custody, and now present in the House, viz: Messrs. Corwin, Hook, Morris, Davis of Indiana, J. Johnson, J. Campbell, McClellan, C. Morris, Saltonstall, Butler, Campbell of Tennessee, Cushing, Randolph, Montgomery, Hill of North Carolina, Fisher, Hastings, Allen of Ohio, Charles Johnston, Warren, Kempshall, Giddings, and Gentry.

The SPEAKER also read the list of those gentlemen who could not be found by the officer of the House, and of those who had been summoned and refused to attend.

Mr. CORWIN of Ohio being the first on the list, was then called on, and addressed by the SPEAKER as follows.

"Mr. CORWIN, you have been absent from the House without leave of the House, and contrary to its laws: if you have any excuse to offer for your absence, the House will now hear it."

Mr. CORWIN said he could assign to the House in a very few words the reasons why he was not in his place during last night. He left the House a little before 10 o'clock, while Mr. HABERSHAM was speaking on the authority of a gentleman who he thought had a good right to speak as to the views and intentions of the Administration party. He alluded to the gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL.] He inquired of him what were the intentions of the majority with regard to the Treasury Note bill, and whether they expected to pass it that night. He told the gentleman that he did not like the business the House was engaged in, and did not intend to have any thing to do with it. On this, he was informed by the gentleman, whose authority he could not question, that the bill was to come out of committee presently, and that it was to be acted on to-day. He had no idea, Mr C. said, that his presence was wanted, and as the gentleman had told him that he did not want his vote, he concluded that he would go home and go to bed. He assured the House that, in absenting himself, he intended to commit no contempt, or evince any want of respect for its authority.

Mr. HOFFMAN moved that Mr. CORWIN be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, without paying the fees.

This question was taken by tellers, Messrs. HOWARD of Indiana, and ANDREWS of Kentucky, and decided in the negative—ayes 36, nays 53.

The SPEAKER then said that the next question would be on permitting Mr. CORWIN to take his seat with payment of the fees.

Mr. BARNARD rose to a point of order; which was, whether less than a quorum could enforce a fine.

The SPEAKER said that any number, not less than fifteen, could compel the attendance of absent members.

Mr. BARNARD. If a minority of the House can enforce a fine, they can expel a member. Mr. B. was proceeding to address the House on the question raised by him, when

Mr. WELLER called him to order, and asked whether he could debate the question after the CHAIR had decided it, without taking an appeal.

Mr. BARNARD. I will gratify the very courteous gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WELLER,] and appeal from the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. PETRIKIN. I demand the previous question on the appeal.

Mr. BARNARD. I desire the very orderly gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PETRIKIN] to wait till he gets the floor, and then he may move the previous question.

Mr. PETRIKIN. I don't want any of the insolence of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER called Mr. PETRIKIN to order.

Mr. PETRIKIN said he acknowledged the impropriety of the language he used, but he was betrayed into it by the very insolent and overbearing manner of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BARNARD called Mr. PETRIKIN to order.

Mr. PETRIKIN. Then I call the gentleman from New York to order, for words spoken of me personally disrespectful.

Mr. BARNARD was proceeding to debate the appeal, when

Mr. DUNCAN called on him to reduce his appeal to writing.

Mr. BARNARD said that he would not reduce his appeal to writing on the demand of the gentleman from Ohio; and continued his remarks in support of the appeal for a short time; when

The SPEAKER required him to reduce it to writing.

Mr. BARNARD then withdrew the appeal.

Mr. CORWIN desired to make an additional explanation. While he had had the honor to hold a seat on that floor during nine years, no action of this kind whatever had taken place. He had no desire to object to the House coming to any decision, in his own case, that might answer the purposes for which these proceedings were instituted; but he desired that if any action was to be had that was to set an example for all times hereafter, that would supersede the necessity of enforcing the attendance of members, a quorum should be present to decide what that action should be. He would observe that he had been here for nine years, and had never before been the subject of censure for absence from his duties till this time. He saw many gentlemen around him who seemed disposed to make a jest of the whole affair—he saw others in their chairs, and he could see but little more criminality in being asleep at home in bed, and being asleep here within the bar. Mr. C. again restated his cause of absence, and then

The question on discharging him, upon the payment of the fees, was taken and carried, during much disorder and confusion.

The other gentlemen on the list were severally called, and the same interrogatory as that put to Mr. CORWIN by the SPEAKER having been put to them in their order, they excused themselves as follows:

Mr. RANDOLPH had paired off with a gentleman, and was not aware that the House was in session till sent for. Discharged on the payment of the fees.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Left the House in consequence of indisposition; was too unwell to sit up. Excused without payment of fees.

Mr HILL of North Carolina. Pleaded indisposition. Was in the House till nearly 11 o'clock, and, being unwell, retired to his room. Excused without payment of fees.

Mr. FISHER, when called upon, asked at what time it was that he was absent. On being answered at 2 o'clock in the morning, he said: I was absent from the House, then, when it was full ten hours after the usual time of adjournment. If I had been absent during the usual hours of doing business, I would have felt that I had committed a gross dereliction of duty; but having been absent ten hours after the usual hour of adjournment, and that, too, after having attended in the House for twelve hours, he had no other reason to give for his absence than that he was away. Discharged on the payment of the fees.

Mr. ALLEN of Ohio was called, when

Messrs. DUNCAN and HOFFMAN reminded the Chair that Mr. ALLEN had already been excused on account of indisposition, both of himself and family: discharged without payment of fees.

Mr. JOHNSON of New York had paired off with Mr. STRONG of New York on the 13th instant, and could not, consistently with propriety, vote till that gentleman's return. He would not attempt to justify the practice of pairing off, and would, therefore, submit his case to the judgment of the House: discharged without the payment of fees

Mr. WARREN excused himself by saying, that seeing the determination of the majority to pass the bill that evening, and the determination of the minority to resist, and believing the contest would not be a very creditable one to the Congress of the United States, he determined to take no part in it: discharged upon the payment of fees.

Mr. KEMPSHALL sat here till a very late hour; got tired and sleepy, and a little heavy; complained of bad health: discharged upon the payment of fees.

Mr. GIDDINGS of Ohio pleaded his general industry and attention to the business of the House, and excused his absence on the ground of the weakness of his eyes, and the injurious effect on them, produced by the glare of so many candles. Discharged upon the payment of fees.

Mr. HOOK excused himself by saying that he had been generally attentive to his duties. Last night he felt somewhat indisposed, and retired to his lodgings. Regretted that he did not remain there. Discharged upon the payment of fees.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana. Excuse not heard by the Reporter. Discharged without payment of fees.

Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia. He could say with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CORWIN,] that he had been for more than ten years a member of this House, but he could not say with him that this was the first time he had ever been arraigned for absence from his seat, for he had on several occasions not only been arraigned, but fined; and he could say to the House that there was no debt that he paid with more cheerfulness. He was in the House attending to his duties, from ten o'clock in the morning until ten o'clock at night, and he felt that his health, as well as his morals, required that he should be in bed at a seasonable hour. He threw himself on the mercy of the House. [Laughter.] Discharged upon the payment of the fees.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina Had no disposition to commit a breach of the rules of the House. He remained in his seat until ten o'clock at night, and then returned to his lodging. Discharged on the payment of fees.

Mr. MCCLELLAN remained in the House till ten o'clock at night, and his health requiring him to take rest, paired off with one of his colleagues. This was the first time he had ever been arraigned for absence from the House, and he was perfectly willing to abide by its decision. Discharged on the payment of fees.

Mr. CALVARY MORRIS had been absent in consequence of extreme indisposition, was still suffering with a severe pain in his side. Excused without payment of the fees.

Mr. SALTONSTALL said he would undertake to say, that since he had been here, no member had been more constant in his attention to his duties than he was. He remained here last evening till after ten o'clock, and after the motion made by his friend from New York, that the committee rise had failed. He confessed, without intending any disrespect to the House that he was astonished at the vote taken on that motion, and that, in all probability, the gentleman would not be allowed an opportunity of addressing the House. Under these circumstances, he apprehended that there would be scenes in the House that it would not be honorable for him to witness and to take part in. It being also necessary for the preservation of his health that he should avoid irregularities, he therefore retired to his lodgings. Discharged upon the payment of fees.

Mr. BUTLER of Kentucky had sat in the House for ten hours, and was tired, hungry, and sleepy. He believed it would be a night of speech making, and not of business, and, as he had generally been an attentive listener to speeches, he concluded he had done his share of that part of legislative duty, and therefore he, at ten o'clock, paired off with a friend. Discharged upon the payment of fees.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Tennessee left the House at ten o'clock, and, in accordance with the custom of all orderly men, went to bed. He had no favors to ask of the House, and particularly in the condition in which he found some of its members. Discharged upon payment of the fees.

Mr. CUSHING had no excuse to give, but out of respect to the intimation of the CHAIR, he would state the circumstances attending his absence. In conformity with the usage of every member of the House, and expecting to be sent for should his vote be wanted, he went home and went to bed. He wished, however, to say one word with regard to the motion that would probably be made in his case [to discharge him upon payment of the fees.] He denied that he was in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, or that he ever was. He came to the House voluntarily, on the information of one of the pages that he was wanted. If the House, upon the false assumption that he was in custody, chose to impose a penalty upon him, he wished the fact to be known. Gentlemen who were absent from the city were not sent for and would not be fined, while those who were here and ready to attend to their duties when summoned, were, it seems, to be fined. This was strangely inconsistent, and he desired to know whether the House was prepared to carry out this principle. If he had been contumacious, and refused to come when sent for, the House might punish him for it; but as it was—that he had come immediately on being sent for, and as he was not in the custody of the officer of the House, he ought not to be fined.

Mr. SALTONSTALL argued that his colleague was in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms—that his being sent for by a messenger, instead of being brought bodily by the Sergeant-at-Arms himself, did not vary the case, and was only a more respectful mode of treating the gentleman.

Mr. CUSHING was then discharged upon payment of the fees.

Mr. GENTRY said he left the House at 12 o'clock at night, perceiving that there was a very strong disposition in one party to debate the question in Committee of the Whole, and a strong disposition in the other party to sit out the debate. He had no wish to participate in the debate, nor did he desire to listen to the speeches that should be made. Having been for the most part of his life a man of regular habits, he went home and went to bed. Most unfortunately for him, however, this House, by its messenger, intruded itself into his bed room this morning, and disturbed him out of his sweet sleep, in consequence of which he looked upon himself as the injured party, and therefore an apology was due to him, instead of from him. Inasmuch, however, as it would be inconvenient for every gentleman of the House to call on him and apologize, he would take it for granted that it was done, and he would agree with the House that they should mutually excuse each other. This was the head and front of his offending, and the length and breadth of his speech. Discharged upon the payment of fees.

The SPEAKER here said that the list of those in custody was now gone through with, and that the Sergeant at-Arms reported that there were three gentlemen whose rooms, being locked, he could not get in. These were Mr. PAYNTER, Mr. BELL, and Mr. CALHOUN. There were, the Sergeant-at-Arms also reported, five gentlemen who had not answered the summons of the House. These were Mr. HILL of Virginia, Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, Mr. MASON of Ohio, Mr. CLARK of New York, and Mr. BUTLER of South Carolina.

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS, it was ordered that the absentees be sent for.

Mr. STANLY then offered the following resolution:

Whereas the calls of the House heretofore have cost the Government several hundred dollars by excusing those gentlemen who were summoned by the Sergeant-at-Arms:

Therefore resolved, That those members who shall be summoned to attend by the Sergeant-at-Arms shall pay the fees due said officer.

This resolution being objected to,

The CHAIR ruled that it was out of order to introduce it at that time.

Mr. STANLY renewed his attempt to offer his resolution.

Mr. PETRIKIN objecting,

Mr. STANLY said the gentleman from Pennsylvania had no right to object, as he had received two days more pay than he was entitled to, and had left the city on a former session without leave.

Mr. PETRIKIN said if the CHAIR did not protect him, he would protect himself, and in a way the gentleman would not much like.

The CHAIR ruled the resolution not to be in order.

[It was now past 6 o'clock in the morning.]

Mr. HOFFMAN moved that the House adjourn: decided by yeas and nays in the negative—yeas 38, nays 101.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. STANLY renewed his attempt to introduce the above resolution.

Mr. PETRIKIN again objecting, it was declared out of order.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved that the call be suspended, and that the doors of the House now be opened.

This was decided by yeas and nays, as follows—yeas 17, nays 113.

So the House refused to suspend the call.

Mr. DAWSON moved that the House take a recess. He appealed to gentlemen on all sides, observing that proceedings like these were oppressive, and disgraceful to the body.

The CHAIR said the motion could only be received by general consent.

Many objecting, it was not entertained.

Mr. M. A. COOPER inquired of the CHAIR whether the order to the Sergeant-at-Arms had not been to bring all the absentees into the House?

The CHAIR replying in the affirmative—

Mr. COOPER further asked whether the House was not bound to wait and receive them?

The CHAIR replied that it was, unless the call should be suspended.

Mr. COOPER then asked whether they must wait for those who were absent from the city?

The CHAIR said they were not understood as included in the order.

Mr. CRAIG said a number of gentlemen were in waiting at the door, and moved they be admitted.

Mr. DROMGOGLE moved to suspend all further proceeding in the call.

Some member moved that, when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock a. m. this day.

This was negatived without a count.

Mr. HOFFMAN moved that, when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock noon.

The yeas and nays were demanded by Mr. WELLER on this motion, and, being taken, resulted as follows—yeas 33, nays 99.

So the House refused Mr. HOFFMAN's motion.

The Sergeant-at-Arms now again entered the Hall, and reported that he had in custody, and present in the House, the following gentlemen, viz: Messrs. Waddy Thompson, Deberry, Rhett, Graham, Prentiss, Butler of South Carolina, S. Mason, Bynum, C. H. Williams, Rogers, Pickens, Evans, Rives, and Hill of Virginia.

The SPEAKER addressing Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, the first on the list, said: Mr. THOMPSON, you have been absent from the House without leave of the House. If you have any excuse to offer for your absence, the House is now ready to hear it.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina said that he had witnessed some of these night scenes before, and he knew that ten members were enough to answer to the calls of the rolls. Besides, being a military man, he went home to take his sleep that he might be in a condition to relieve guard in the morning. Having thus had ten hours sleep, he was now ready to do duty for the remainder of the day. Discharged upon the payment of the fees.

The other gentlemen on the list were similarly addressed by the SPEAKER, and excused themselves as follows:

Mr. DEBERRY remained at his post till near twelve o'clock; was unwell and unable to sit out the night. Discharged without payment of the fees.

Mr. RHETT. Remained in his seat till quarter past 1 o'clock. Continued sitting in the House rendered him very unwell, and he went home, and to bed. When the Sergeant-at-Arms came for him, he answered that he was too unwell to answer the summons of the House. Discharged upon the payment of fees.

Mr. PRENTISS said that he remained in his seat till 12 o'clock at night. Feeling unwell, he paired off with a colleague. Discharged on the payment of the fees.

Mr. GRAHAM. Excuses not heard in full; but ill health was one of them. This was the first time he had been absent from the House during a call, since he had been a member of Congress. Excused without payment of fees.

Mr. BUTLER of South Carolina had no excuse to make, but would state the facts. He was so unwell yesterday, that he should not have attended the House at all, had it not been for the important question that was before it. He remained in the House as long as his strength permitted, and then retired to his lodgings. Excused without payment of the fees.

Messrs BYNUM and MASON were also excused without payment of the fees, on account of indisposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Tennessee said he left the House at 10 o'clock at night, having paired off with one of his colleagues. He professed to be as patriotic as most men, and as anxious to do his duty to his country; but he did not like the idea of dying in the service. Discharged upon the payment of fees.

Mr. ROGERS of South Carolina said that his health was bad all the winter. He was not, it was true, sick when he left the House last night, but he knew that he would have become so, had he sat here all night. Discharged upon the payment of the fees.

Mr. PICKENS said he remained in the House till near ten o'clock at night. He felt very much indisposed, and retired to his lodgings. When the Sergeant-at-Arms first called on him, he told him that he would come to the House if he would send him a hack; but the hack was not sent. Discharged upon the payment of the fees.

Mr. EVANS of Maine was excused on account of indisposition without the payment of the fees.

Mr. RIVES of Virginia left the House between eleven and twelve o'clock very unwell. Excused without payment of fees.

Mr. HILL of Virginia. Had paired off with his colleague, [Mr.

RIVES,] being rather unwell, and could not come to the House, in his colleague's absence, and vote without a breach of faith.
Discharged upon payment of fees.

Mr. NISBET was excused on account of sickness.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to suspend all further proceedings under the call.

Mr. FILLMORE opposed the motion.

Mr. GRAVES called for the yeas and nays; when

Mr. DROMGOOLE withdrew the motion.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to dispense with all further proceedings under the call, which motion prevailed—yeas 103, nays 45.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWSON in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Treasury Note bill.

Mr. BARNARD, without proceeding in his remarks, again made the motion that the committe rise at 8 o'clock, a. m. Wednesday.

Upon which question, tellers were called for, and Messrs. JAMESON and ANDREWS were appointed such, who reported that there were—ayes 47, noes 93.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. BARNARD having again resumed the floor, spoke a short time, and said he must again plead the same excuse he had twelve hours before pleaded, that of physical disability to proceed in the argument to the extent he wished, and moved that the committee rise.

Mr. VANDERPOEL called for tellers on that motion.

Mr. PETRIKIN inquired of the CHAIR whether the motion to rise could be amended.

The CHAIR was understood to say that it could.

Mr. PETRIKIN complained of the affected manner of the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] who he said had kept the House in session all night, and yet pleaded indisposition as the reason for not proceeding. To save the House from further difficulty, he would move to amend the motion that the committee rise, by adding "and report the bill."

Mr. MARVIN called Mr. P. to order, and inquired of the CHAIR whether the motion to rise could be amended.

The CHAIR decided that the motion to amend was in order.

Mr. PETRIKIN thought it very singular that he could not get up, whether in order or out of order, without being interrupted by learned lawyers on that floor.

Mr. CRAIG said he objected to the decision of the CHAIR, and contended that the motion was not in order. The motion in committee that the committee rise, stood on the same principle as a motion in the House for adjournment, neither of which was susceptible of amendment. As it involved a question of the utmost importance, he took an appeal from the decision to the CHAIR.

Mr. JAMESON coincided with the opinion of the CHAIR, that the motion could be amended; as also could the motion to adjourn. The motions to rise and adjourn were general, but the House and the committee had the right to make them specific.

Mr. CASEY sincerely hoped the SPEAKER would revise his decision; it was not conformable to previous practice, and would lead to bad results upon the business of the House. He argued that a motion to adjourn was always in order; and it was not competent to amend it under any circumstances.

The CHAIR, on reflection, reviewed and reversed his decision, and declared the motion for the committee to rise not amendable; and said if it was incorrect, gentlemen could take an appeal.

Mr. PETRIKIN appealed from this decision.

Mr. CASEY said it seemed to him that the character of the House, and their own character, required that the committee should rise and report the bill to the House, and adjourn the House over till to-morrow, and debate it on that day, with the understanding that the question should be taken before the adjournment on that day. He appealed to all parties in the House in view of their then exhausted condition, seriously to consider the propriety of the course he suggested. Their own health, as well as the public interest, required such a course. It would greatly expedite the action on this bill.

Mr. HAND said, with the understanding that the bill should be reported to the House at that time, he would agree that the House should adjourn till to-morrow, on which day the bill should be finally disposed of; with the understanding also that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] should be entitled to the floor in the House on the bill.

The CHAIR said it could be only done by general consent; if no objection was heard, he should put the question on the committee's rising.

Mr DROMGOOLE said, if the understanding was that the bill should be reported to the House, he had no objection; but as to any pledge further than that, he considered it unparliamentary, and could not therefore accede to it.

Mr. BARNARD enquired of the chairman of Ways and Means [Mr. JONES] if he had any objection to the understanding suggested.

Mr. JONES replied that, so far as he was concerned, he had not the slightest objection to the agreement, and hoped his friends who act with him would agree to it.

Mr. BARNARD asked if it were possible any gentleman would rise and object to such a proposition.

Mr. DROMGOOLE immediately rose and said he had no objection to the rising of the committee, but would consent to no understanding or pledges of any kind.

Much confusion prevailed; it was with difficulty any thing could be distinctly heard.

Mr. BARNARD inquired whether he could, in the House, be allowed to reply to what had been urged in the committee?

The CHAIR replied it could be done only by consent.

Mr. PETRIKIN insisted on his appeal.

Mr. BARNARD was understood as pressing the compromise which had been proposed.

Mr. JONES said, so far as he was concerned, he would assent to it with pleasure.

Some conversation here took place between Messrs. BARNARD and WADDY THOMPSON, when

Mr. FISHER said he was utterly opposed to any agreement. He was, however, willing that the usual motion should be made that the committee rise and report the bill to the House, and would then be willing to hear the gentleman from New York; but he was utterly opposed to any arrangement which would give one gentleman the floor to the exclusion of others who wished to be heard.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON remonstrated, and urged a compromise.

Mr. FISHER said he would never consent that in the House one gentleman should have the floor, and all the rest be cut off.

Mr. VANDERPOEL hoped that all would accede to this reasonable proposition.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. I never will consent to any such thing.

Mr. PROFFIT. I will agree to no such arrangement. I will never let this bill pass without putting on it an amendment for the Cumberland road of $450,000 out of these five millions.

Much confusion arose, and the noise was very great.

At lenghth the proposition for a compromise seemed to be given up in despair.

Mr. PETRIKIN insisted on his appeal.

But the CHAIR having stated his decision, and put the question to the committee,

Mr. PETRIKIN withdrew his appeal.

It was then moved that the committee rise.

On that question tellers were appointed, and the vote decided in the affirmative—ayes 82, noes 40.

The committee thereupon rose.

In the House, Mr. BANKS moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill. There had been considerable discussion, and if the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] wished it, he could have an opportunity of discussing the bill in the House.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS asked if the bill did not contain an appropriation.

The CHAIR was understood to reply in the affirmative.

Mr. WILLIAMS then insisted that it could not be passed unless it should be reported by a committee.

Messrs. EVANS, CLIFFORD, LEWIS WILLIAMS, BELL, and BANKS, discussed the question of order at considerable length.

The CHAIR inclined to the opinion that Mr. BANKS's motion was in order, and quoted some authorities from the Manual in favor of that opinion. But after an examination of the bill, and there being an appropriation of $20,000, and a further examination of the rules in relation to the question,

The SPEAAER reversed his opinion; when

Mr. BANKS said that he did not see any appropriation, or a levy of taxes: to cut the matter short, he would move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, and take into consideration the Treasury Note bill.

The motion was agreed to without a division; and the House thereupon went into committee, Mr. DAWSON in the chair.

Mr. BARNARD having the floor, without proceeding in his remarks, immediately moved that the committee rise.

Tellers were demanded, and Messrs. EVANS and MCKAY were appointed such; and the question being put, the ayes were 4, and the noes 98.

[The Whig party either remained in their seats or retired to the outside of the bar, for the purpose of making no quorum of the committee.] No quorum having voted,

Mr. CHAPMAN asked that tellers might be appointed to count the committee.

The CHAIRMAN counted, and reported that there were 129 members present, but said he could not act otherwise than to rise and report, that on a division, there was no quorum.

The committee rose and reported that fact.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved a call of the House.

The motion prevailed, and the Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when 115 members responded to their names.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Tennessee moved an adjournment; but it was negatived—yeas 31, nays 79.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The absentees were then called, and 165 gentlemen answered to their names.

Mr. RUSSELL moved to suspend the call, with a view to move that the House adjourn till to-morrow.

Mr. MONTGOMERY gave notice he would be bound by no arrangements and pledges others might choose to make.

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the call; which were ordered; and were—yeas 49, nays 57.

So the House refused to suspend the call.

The list of absentees was now called over, when

On motion of Mr. MCKAY, all further proceedings in the call were dispensed with.

Messrs. ALFORD. ANDERSON, CARROLL, DAVIS of Kentucky, DOIG, RUSSELL, FLETCHER, GRANGER, LAWRENCE, NAYLOR, NISBET, RARIDEN, CHARLES SHEPARD, PECK, REED, SMITH, of Indiana, VROOM, WHITE of Louisiana, CHINN, S. WILLIAMS, were excused, some on account of indisposition, and others on account of absence from the city.

And Messrs. BLACK, BOTTS, and TILLINGHAST, were not excused.

Mr. RHETT then rose to make a proposition, to which he thought all parties should agree. The proposition which had been made this morning, to assign a particular time for taking the bill out of committee, (Mr. R. was understood to say,) had been opposed on the ground of giving the floor to a particular member. It appeared to him that all gentlemen ought to have a fair opportunity of being heard. The struggle had been carried on four hours longer, and they were just where they were last evening; and it seemed to him that they might continue here four or five days longer. This was a struggle between the strong and the weak. It seemed to him that if a particular day and time were fixed, the object of all parties would be attained. Scenes of this description had taken place at previous Congresses again and again, and at last it had been necessary to resort to compromise. It was the only course that could be pursued. He proposed, therefore, that by general consent, the bill should be taken out of Committee of the Whole, and acted on at six o'clock to-morrow evening.'

[Cries of "I won't agree to that." "I object." "Take it out now."]

Mr. R. said they might take it out of committee now, but it could not be passed now. It would come down to this, who could struggle longest and best? Men would not yield when their passions were up. But it was to be remembered that their business here was not to carry out their own feelings and views, but that they were here to do the business of the country—to relieve the Government—to act upon high feelings of patriotism. The Government could not be injured—no material injury could accrue to any body—and he hoped that, by general consent, his proposition would be agreed to.

Mr. WISE would not consent, he said, to decide upon measures of this kind at any particular hour of any particular day. As one of the minority, he did not intend to debate the bill, though he had expected to have said a few words. As gentlemen seemed determined to sit here, the best way would be for the House to resolve itself back again into Committee of the Whole.

The proposition of Mr. RHETT not meeting with favor, and the SPEAKER having announced that a quorum of members was now in attendance,

The House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWSON in the chair,) whereupon

Mr. BEATTY claimed the floor.

The CHAIRMAN announced that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BEATTY rose to a point of order. He wished to know whether it was in order for the gentleman from New York to occupy the floor every time when the House went into committee, for the purpose of moving that it rise. The gentleman had been up five times already, each time complaining that he was too unwell to speak, and moving that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN said the gentleman would be kind enough to take his seat.

Mr. BARNARD moved that the committee rise and have leave to sit again; but said he would yield the floor simply for the purpose of enabling Mr. PROFFIT to offer an amendment

After some further objections on the part of Mr. BEATTY, that gentleman appealed from the decision of the CHAIR, giving the floor to MR. BARNARD.

Mr. PROFFIT offered an amendment, appropriating the sum of $450,000 for the continuation of the Cumberland road through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Mr. VANDERPOEL rose to a point of order.

Mr. BARNARD insisted on his motion that the committee rise.

Mr. VANDERPOEL submitted that the amendment of Mr. PROFFIT was not in order, being an entirely new proposition. The gentleman might as well introduce a proposition to establish a Mint.

After some conversation, not distinctly heard, owing to the confusion in the hall,

The CHAIRMAN announced Mr. PROFFIT's amendment to be out of order.

From this decision Mr. P. appealed.

The CHAIRMAN said the first question was on the appeal taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BEATTY] from the decision of the CHAIR, giving the floor to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD.]

And the question being taken, the decision of the CHAIR was affirmed.

Mr. PROFFIT here proceeding to speak to his appeal from the decision of the CHAIR that the amendment offered by him was not in order—

The CHAIRMAN said there was a motion pending that the committee rise, which was the first question in order.

And, after some conversation, the question was taken, and the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN having explained the condition of the question before the committee to be, that there was an amendment to an amendment pending, and that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] was entitled to the floor on the latter, and, therefore, that the amendment of Mr. PROFFIT was, under no circumstances, in order at this time,

Mr. PROFFIT assented thereto.

And, it being now half past ten, a. m.

Mr. BARNARD took the floor, and addressed the committee at length in opposition to the bill, notwithstanding, he said, there had been nothing in the action of the House, for the last twelve or fourteen hours, calculated to refresh any of its members, and least of all one situated as he was. He said he was not opposed to the Government borrowing money to meet its exigencies, by way of a direct loan; nor was he opposed to borrowing money by the issuing of Treasury notes; but he was opposed to giving the power to the Government of issuing these notes in such a manner as would enable the notes to be circulated as money. The bill in the present form would be, in effect, the establishment of a Treasury bank. These Treasury notes were the worst kind of paper ever invented in the worst times in the worst countries in the world. Mr. B. then went into a detailed history of the banking system, and the present mode of banking in this country, and was understood to be in favor of small bill circulation.

Thd hour of 12 having arrived,

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose and made the point of order that, being now the usual hour for reading the journal and proceeding to the regular business of the House, under its standing rules, the committee must rise. The discussion otherwise might be continued day after day, week after week, and month after month, without touching the regular business. He asked whether the House was willing to set such an example.

Mr. VANDERPOEL rose to suggest that there was an analogous case.

The CHAIR said there was an analogous case in the year 1836, in the case of the admission of the States of Arkansas and Michigan, in which the same point had been raised. In that case the committee did not rise; and the decision of the CHAIR would now be governed by that precedent.

So the committee did not rise.

Mr. BARNARD then resumed his remarks. He spoke at great length to show that this bill might, in connection with the Sub-Treasury bill, be converted into a bank of issue and discount; and that the bill for this issue, without the amendments he proposed, would admit of the notes being kept in circulation after the manner of bank paper; and they were subject to fluctuation in value to a great extent, in proportion as there was a demand to pay duties. Mr. B. concluded at one o'clock.

The CHAIR then gave the floor to

Mr. GOGGIN, who spoke at much length in opposition to the bill. In the course of his remarks, he avowed himself a friend of a National Bank, but that he was not prepared to urge the establishment of it in the present state of public sentiment; but if any considerable change took place, he was prepared to advocate it, not only on the ground of its expediency, but of its constitutionality also. At the close of his remarks,

The CHAIR gave the floor to

Mr. DUNCAN, who having spoken for some time in favor of the bill, yielded the floor to

Mr. DAVEE, who moved that the committee now rise, and report the bill to the House.

Mr. DUNCAN said he was willing that the motion should be

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

26TH CONG.....1ST SESS. TUESDAY, APRIL 7, 1840. VOLUME 8.....No. 19.

BY BLAIR & RIVES. ——WEEKLY—— PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

put, with the understanding, however, that if it failed he did not lose his right to the floor.

Mr. R. GARLAND said that the motion to rise and report the bill was debatable; and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DAVEE] would not attain the object he expected by the prevalence of the motion.

Mr. DAVEE then withdrew his motion, and

Mr. DUNCAN resumed his remarks. After proceeding for some time, he gave way at the request of

Mr. RAYNER, who said that, with his permission, he would submit a proposition, which he hoped would be generally acceded to. The party with which he acted would not recede from the stand which it had taken. He would therefore propose that the committee should now rise without reporting the bill, but with the understanding that the bill shall be reported before we rise at our next sitting.

Mr. DUNCAN having yielded the floor for the purpose, the motion for the committee to rise was then put, and tellers having been called for,

The CHAIR appointed Messrs. WATTERSON and LEWIS, who reported ayes 29, noes 34.

No quorum voting, the committee rose, and the SPEAKER having resumed the chair,

Mr. DAWSON, chairman of the committee, reported that the Committee of the Whole had under consideration the bill authorizing an issue of Treasury notes, and finding itself without a quorum, had directed him to report that fact to the House.

Mr. DAWSON then moved that the House adjourn, and the yeas and nays having been ordered, it was decided in the negative—yeas 36, nays 48.

Mr. DUNCAN said he had determined to remain until the question was settled, but he was convinced that the best course now would be to adjourn with the understanding that the bill should be disposed of at our next sitting. He had no objection to yield the floor with such an understanding.

Mr. DAWSON then proposed that the House should adjourn, and that it should be understood that to-morrow the bill should be taken up, and disposed of before adjournment.

Mr. PICKENS said he hoped the proposition would be agreed to. It was useless to sit here—it was too great a trial on the constitutions of the members.

Mr. HOFFMAN was satisfied, he said, that this was the only way in which the bill could ever be disposed of. Any man who desired this bill to pass, should agree to the adoption of some such proposition.

Mr. DAWSON moved an adjournment; on which motion the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CRABB said there was a principle involved in this matter, and he would take no compromise. He would stay here until a proper hour, and then he would vote for an adjournment, but he would not be transferred in this way by any leader or any party.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said he would vote against any such agreement.

The question was then taken on the motion for adjournment, the ayes and noes being ordered, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 73, nays 34.

So at fifteen minutes to five o'clock, on Wednesday evening, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, March 25, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a communication from the War Department, transmitting a report from the Topographical bureau on a survey of certain lakes and rivers in Wiskonsin; which was laid on the table.

Also, the following report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to a resolution of the Senate of the 23d inst.; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 25, 1840.

Sir: I have the honor to submit this report in compliance with a resolution of the Senate passed the 23d inst. in the following words:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury inform the Senate, what proportion of Treasury notes, issued under the authority of the act of October 12th, 1837, and subsequent acts, has been paid to public creditors of the United States, in discharge of their claims, and what proportion has been used for the purpose of borrowing money, from banks, or individuals; together with a statement of the rates of interest, borne by the notes of the several issues, respectively.

"And that he also inform the Senate, whether Treasury notes, bearing interest, have been deposited in banks, for the purpose of raising a credit, to be drawn against by the Treasury Department; and if any such deposites have been made, to state the dates and amounts thereof, and the dates and sums of the drafts made thereon."

In answer to the first inquiry, I transmit herewith a statement prepared by the Treasurer showing the rates of interest and the proportions, whether in exchange for specie, or in payments of the issues of Treasury notes under the authority of the act of 12th October, 1837, and subsequent acts, as required by the resolution.

In reply to the other inquiry, I would observe that no Treasury notes issued under the authority of either of the acts mentioned, have been deposited in banks, by this Department, or by its sanction, for the purpose of raising a credit, to be drawn against by the Department. But to facilitate the exchange of specie for Treasury notes, without the delay and expense of transporting it to this city, and then carrying it back for expenditure, numerous individuals and corporations have been permitted to place specie in special deposite to the credit of the Treasurer in certain specified banks; and Treasury notes to a corresponding amount have been afterwards, and not till then, issued in their favor upon the certificates of deposite, as shown by the Treasurer's accompanying statement.

It may be proper to add that, by pursuing this course, many risks have been avoided, as well as the payment of any commissions to bankers or brokers for selling the notes, and at the same time the disposal of any of them by the Government, except at par, and for any thing except specie, or its equivalent, has been effectually prevented.

Respectfully, L. WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. R. M. JOHNSON,
Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

Mr. PORTER presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of a general bankrupt law; which was read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. YOUNG presented a petition from citizens of Warren county, Illinois, praying for the establishment of a post route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the memorial of James Williams, made a special report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred the memorial of the Legislature of Michigan on the subject of a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi river, made an adverse report thereon.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred the memorial of the Legislature of Wiskonsin, relative to a railroad from Platteville to the Mississippi on Platt river, made an adverse report thereon.

Mr. NORVELL, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill fixing the time for the meeting of the next session of Congress; which was read, and ordered to a second reading. [The bill proposes that the next session shall commence on the second Tuesday in November next.

Mr. STRANGE, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of James Herron; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business,

And afterwards adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, February 26th, 1840.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications, viz:

1. Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in reply to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 24th ultimo, requiring of him to communicate why no patents have been issued to claimants to, or purchasers of, land in the St. Helana or Greensburg land district, in the State of Louisiana:

Which, on motion of Mr. CHINN, was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

2. Additional papers from the Secretary of War, to accompany the letter from the Secretary of War laid before the House on the 19th instant, respecting the non-establishment of a military post near the western boundary of the State of Louisiana:

On motion of Mr. R. GARLAND, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

3. Message from the President of the United States, transmitting the report of commissioners on the Post Office building:

Referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings.

4. Letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the information required by the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 9th instant, in relation to proceedings under the treaty of 1st November, with the Winnebagoes:

Referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House some further testimony in relation to the New Jersey contested election.

Mr. MEDILL said it was a part of the testimony connected with what was called the "mysterious package," and he moved that it be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. R. GARLAND said that was the very testimony which he wished to be kept before the House. The object of his amendment now before the House, was to withdraw that mysterious package from the committee. He had moved to lay the other testimony on the table with that view; and he moved that it lie on the table; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. REYNOLDS of Illinois asked leave of the House to present a bill to authorize the Secretary of War to cause a survey and estimates of the Cumberland road from Vandalia, by Greenville, to Alton, in the State of Illinois, to be made Mr. R. said that the committee were permitted to make reports only at one time during the present session of Congress, in consequence of which, this subject would not be brought before the House. On this consideration, he asked leave of the House to bring in the above bill, and have it referred to the proper committee; but

Mr. DAWSON objected, and the motion was not admitted.

Mr. J. W. JONES, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, asked leave to report from that committee the Sub-Treasury bill.

Messrs. ANDREWS of Kentucky, and PROFFIT, objected to its introduction, when

Mr. CONNER moved a suspension of the rules, to admit the report, and demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, when

The gentlemen objecting withdrew their objection.

The bill was then reported, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER announced the unfinished business of the morning hour to be the resolution heretofore reported by Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, from the Committee of Elections, to print all the testimony in relation to the contested election in the State of New Jersey, to which an amendment had been heretofore offered by Mr. R. GARLAND to print the testimony received since the report of the said committee was made.

Mr. BOTTS, who was entitled to the floor on the above question, concluded his remarks. He censured the course of the majority of the committee, pretty much as has been heretofore reported; and Mr. B. having concluded,

Mr. ANDREWS moved the previous question.

Mr. RIVES asked the favor of the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw his motion. The gentleman knew the character of the remarks made by his colleague. They were entirely fallacious, and he wished to have an opportunity of correcting them.

Mr. ANDREWS said, that as this debate had already lasted four weeks, and had been confined entirely to the members of the committee, he could not withdraw.

Mr. CAMPBELL appealed to the gentleman to withdraw his motion. He made this request not because he himself cared any think about it, or that he was unwilling to let the question go before the country on the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BROWN,] or even the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOTTS,] but because other members of the committee were anxious to reply to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr CHAPMAN hoped the gentleman would withdraw his motion, and enable some gentleman to reply to the argument by which every member of the House, who voted with the majority, had been charged with corruption. He, for one, was ready to answer the gentleman from Virginia, and to demonstrate the fallacy of his argument.

Mr ANDREWS said, that upon the appeal of the chairman of the committee, he would withdraw his motion for the previous question.

Mr. MEDILL obtained the floor, and observed that it was no intention of his, at the present time, to occupy the time of the House long, and he would condense what he had to say in as brief a space as possible. He would first notice the remark of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ANDREWS,] that the debate had been confined to the members of the committee, and begged leave to correct him.

Mr. ANDREWS rose to explain. He had not recollected at the time that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] had addressed the House on the subject.

Mr. MEDILL wished to say that, so far as the members of the committee were concerned, there had been more time occupied in the discussion of this subject, by a gentleman who not only was not a member of the committee, [Mr. JENIFER,] but who was perceived by every member on the floor to know nothing of the question, than had been occupied by any member of the majority of the committee.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] supposed it a very remarkable thing that a member of this House who was not a member of the committee, should think proper to submit a resolution for the purpose of instructing that committee to report certain facts in their possession. Why then had this other individual been called on to engage in debate, not for the purpose of examining into the merits of the question—not for the purpose of ascertaining whether the committee had correctly reported the facts before them, but for the purpose of personal crimination and for the purpose of impeaching, if possible, the veracity of the members of the committee. Was it possible that members of the committee would suffer their words to be impeached without defending themselves? Had the gentlemen who were opposed to the report ever since the debate commenced, called for the reading of any testimony to impeach its correctness? Had they, in that document which they called the suppressed report, stated that the report of the majority did not contain facts? No, sir; they tacitly admitted the correctness of the facts stated, complaining only that the committee did not come to a correct conclusion, and that they had acted with unjust and unnecessary haste. Was it upon the conduct of the committee that the House was called upon to vote, or upon the facts which the committee had set forth? Was this the issue which the gentlemen wished to present to the country? It was not complained that those gentlemen excluded had received a majority of the votes; it was not even pretended that they had received a majority of votes which they now denominate legal, by the exclusion of all unqualified voters. No, the complaint was that the committee had been acting unjustly, precipitately, and without a due regard to the interests of the country, and the rights of the parties who have been excluded. Was this the issue which gentlemen wanted to bring before the country? Was this the object for which the committee was appointed? Sir, said Mr. M. this committee reported only one single fact, and that was, which five of the claimants received the greatest number of votes. This was the fact they were directed by the House to report upon. Did gentlemen undertake to say that the committee had reported otherwise than the truth? Did they undertake to say that the committee had reported votes that were not lawful? If so, let them produce the evidence. I say, and I say it fearlessly, there was no testimony when this report was made, other than what I have stated to the House. I say confidently, and I have said it before, that there was no testimony, which even the gentlemen themselves voted to receive, that impeached more than twelve or thirteen votes, while the majorities ranged from thirty to two hundred.

Mr. ADAMS here interrupted Mr. MEDIL'; but his remark was not heard.

Mr. MEDILL continued. I pledge myself to convince even the gentleman himself, stubborn as he is, that we reported fairly, in conformity with the instructions of the House, and in conformity with truth and justice. He wished to advise gentlemen that there was more testimony to come before them—not that one-sided testimony that was sealed up and brought into the House fraudulently, as he would undertake to prove—but testimony that contradicted it conclusively, and proved beyond a doubt that it was false and fallacious.

Mr. ADAMS said that he spoke of the testimony that was suppressed, and that the committee prevented from being received.

Mr. MEDILL ventured to assert that before the gentleman was done with that suppressed testimony, as he was pleased to call it, he would be sorry that his friends had ever mentioned it. Mr. M. then stated the manner in which the committee took up and examined the various testimony before it. They first took up the votes which were before the Governor and Council, and which had been counted by them. These certificate gentlemen came into this House with returns predicated on certain votes which had been counted by the Governor and Council. The committee took these as legal, because they had been admitted as such by both parties, and they added to them the suppressed returns of Millville and South Amboy. This was the only question which the Opposition could now make, and he would be able to show that these votes were correctly counted, but that there was no testimony impeaching them. On a previous occasion he showed to the House that the votes of one of these townships were acted on and pronounced legal by the Legislature of New Jersey. Here Mr. M. referred to a contested election case in that Legislature, in which a member having been excluded in consequence of the suppression of the votes of this township, and his competitor put in, the Legislature counted these votes, and gave the seat to the excluded member. This was done, too, upon a report by a Whig committee, and by a Whig Legislature. Did gentlemen wish for any further testimony?

Mr. ADAMS interrupted Mr. M. again, but his remark was not heard.

Mr. MEDILL. All I can say to the gentleman is, that there appears to be a little difference between the Whigs there and the Whigs here.

In relation to the returns of South Amboy, we have not only the fact that they were suppressed, but the return of the clerk himself, with his signature and seal, stating that they were received within the time required by law, and were placed on file, but that they were not in conformity with law. Now the committee thought that the clerk was not the proper person to judge of the law of the case; they determined that they were the judges, and not the clerk, and decided that the returns were in conformity with law. What was the reason the clerk suppressed this return? He alleged that the name of Ward was on the list as an inspector of the elections, instead of Clark.

Mr. BOTTS here explained.

Mr. MEDILL continued. The only reason why this return was not received, according to the clerk's showing, was that there was no certificate sent up that Mr. Ward had been elected an inspector of the elections within the time prescribed by law. But was this an argument against the legality of the votes that were taken at this township? Did that make the votes illegal? Would the gentleman from Massachusetts agree to deprive the people of New Jersey of one of the most estimable privileges which belonged to freemen, because of the omission of this mere matter of form on the part of the township officers?

Mr. JONES of Virginia here asked if the morning hour had not expired, and moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to take into consideration the Treasury Note bill.

Mr. BLACK asked permission to present the report of the Select Committee on Printing. This was the day on which the committee was required to report, and the order of the House gave the subject the preference over all other business till disposed of. He did not desire or anticipate any debate, but merely wished to present the report and have it printed with the testimony, so that he might be relieved from the charge imposed on him. This could be done in five minutes. There would be a report from the minority of the committee, and the resolution he was about to offer, also included that in the order for printing. Mr. B. then submitted his report and resolution.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana had no objection to the motion; but he wished to know if the gentleman had reported on that branch of the subject committed to them, which directed an inquiry into the expediency of separating the public printing from the political press? He made this inquiry because he wished to notice this subject in the minority report, if the chairman had not done so.

Mr. BLACK replied, that the gentleman knew, as well as he did, that that branch of the subject was not touched on in the report. The labors of the committee in collecting and examining a vast mass of testimony had been exceedingly arduous, and they had not time to make up a report on that subject. They however contemplated doing so very shortly, and in time for the House to act on it.

The SPEAKER said that, by general consent, the report and resolution would be received, and the resolution, without there was objection, would be considered as adopted.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. DAWSON in the chair, and took into consideration the Treasury note bill.

Mr. DUNCAN said when the House adjourned on yesterday it was the understanding that the question on the bill should be taken to day. It has been said since that time that it was also the understanding that his remarks should be limited to a certain period. That was not his understanding of the matter; because he felt that he was called upon, from a sense of duty, to answer at some length the unfounded charges against the Administration. One of those charges was made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON,] that neither the President in his message, or the Secretary of the Treasury in his report, had intimated that there would be any deficit in the Treasury, or any necessity for the issue of these Treasury notes. The gentleman made this charge when he had these documents in his hand, commenting upon them. Now this charge was without foundation, and the gentleman must have known it. But it was not suitable to his purpose to read all the documents, when commenting on them. The gentleman wished (said Mr. D.) that it should go forth to the country, as prophecy of his own, that there would be a deficit in the Treasury, to get the commendations of his party in the nation for his clearsightedness. Now (said Mr. D.) the President and the Secretary of the Treasury both have said there would be a deficit in the Treasury; that the receipts anticipated, from the revenues alone, would not be adequate to the wants of the Government. The Secretary stated that in a certain contingency, there would be a deficit of upwards of two and a half millions. This charge has been made by several of the gentlemen in the Opposition, and circulated in their speeches, far and wide, for political capital by political imposition, when the facts in the case were just the reverse of what they stated.

Mr. D. then replied to that part of the charge of Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, that the Government had paid off some of its Florida troops in depreciated bank paper. That gentleman had told that tale three times, as with tears in his eyes; if not in his own, he has at least nearly produced them in mine. In reference to this charge he replied that the Government had nothing to do with it. The Government happened to have no funds at the time when the troops were discharged. The troops required their officers to make an arrangement with the banks to get them money, and these officers did procure for them the best bank paper that could be had. It was done at their solicitation in advance of the receipt of the funds of the Government. So much for that charge. It had always been, and it was now, a part of the principles of the Democratic creed, that there should be a sound currency—a gold and silver currency, the only just and the constitutional currency. It was to obviate the dreadful effects of a depreciated currency upon the working classes and those soldiers who have been fighting the battles of the country, and to save them from the swindling operations of the banks, that the exertions of the Democratic party had been directed; for, during the past and present Administrations, the Sub-Treasury, which has been so much denounced had been brought forward to that end. It was the policy of the past and present Administrations to secure to the laborer a just reward for his labor, in specie or its equivalent, and not in a depreciated paper, as had been charged. The efforts of the gentleman and his party have been directed to thwart the Administration in their efforts to bring about a currency, stable in value.

Mr. D. then adverted to the Treasury specie circular, which had been so frequently denounced by the gentleman from South Carolina, and the party to which he was attached. He asked that gentleman what would have been the desolating effects upon the country, if the depreciated bank paper had continued to be received by the Government? As it was, the greater part of the public domain passed into the hands of rapacious speculators. If this circular had not been resorted to, all the public lands would have passed into the hands of these speculators, and bank officers, and bank agents, before the reaction, and without any equivalent to the Government. The great fault was that the circular was not issued soon enough to prevent the blighting effects upon the interests of the nation in consequence of the receipt of the worthless rags of the banks. It is one of the standing charges against the Administration, that it was opposed to all local banks. The Administration was not more opposed to them now than formerly. The Democratic party have been always opposed to their corruptions and abuses. The opposition to the banks, by the Administration party, grew out of the high handed course of these institutions towards the Government. They bade defiance to the Government, and disregarded the laws made for their government. They have shut their doors against the power of the people to ferret out their abuses. Notwithstanding the President recommended time to these institutions to pay up the many millions of the public funds which they held on to by closing their doors, yet he is denounced by the Federal party as being inimical to the banks, and as being desirous to crush them. Yet this is the evidence of hostility. The President and the Democratic party are opposed to their abuses.

Mr. D. then replied to the complaints of Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, that the Executive had improperly managed the Florida war, and had not acted with sufficient energy. He went into a full history of that war, showing, by official documents, that the President employed all the forces which Congress placed at his disposal, with great promptness, and that he had commanded the services of all the best officers of the nation in that war. The difficulties existed in the nature of the country, and not in a defect of the means employed. The gentleman who now complained that a sufficient force was not sent there, was the first of his party to denounce the President when any call was made for increasing the forces in Florida. There was no course the Administration could possibly devise on any question, that would meet the approbation of that gentleman and his party. Their object was to overthrow the Administration, if it overthrew the Government, and deprived the people of their liberty. They are now endeavoring to excite the sympathy of the people in behalf of the savages who are butchering the defenceless women and children in Floriada, because it had been charged that the Government had employed bloodhounds to ferret out these savages from their fastnesses. The charge that the Government had employed them to worry the savages is proved, by the report of the Secretary of War, to be without foundation. But it could not be expected that, whatever means the Government employed to save the suffering people of Florida from being butchered, those means would meet with the approbation of a party that, during the last war with England, invoked the vengeance of Heaven on those who were bleeding in defence of their country.

Mr. D. before concluding, showed, by documents, that the puritans of New England had employed bloodhounds against the Indians.

Mr. D. said he had a document in his hand, which contained the yeas and nays taken during the present session, on questions of adjournment. He would publish it in his speech, to show the people that there is no truth in the charge that the Democrats, having the majority, would do nothing. Although the minority can do nothing, they can, by the rules, prevent the majority from transacting the public business, and they have prevented the majority from doing any thing. In the case of the New Jersey contested election, the Democratic members, (who were clearly elected) were not permitted to take their seats for three months. Mr. D. remarked that he was aware of the important business to be transacted, and he would, therefore, retain the floor no longer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said he did not rise for the purpose of taking part in the many topics which had been introduced by gentlemen who had spoken on this bill. When he first became a member of Congress, the practice prevailed of referring the President's message to the Committee of the Whole. At the present session no such reference had been made, and it is to be much regretted. If gentlemen cannot express their views on one subject, they can on another. Then let gentlemen pass this measure, and do the business, and speak to Buncombe on some other measure. Mr. U. would barely remark, that when the compromise in respect to adjournment was proposed on yesterday, that he did not consider himself pledged that the subject before the House should be disposed of to-day. He would offer an amendment which, he thought, ought to be received in good faith by every member. A considerable number believe, since the publication of the Madison Papers, that Congress has no power to issue paper designed for circulation. He thought there could be no difficulty, on constitutional grounds, to pay this paper to a bona fide creditor of the Government. If the creditor chose to throw it into circulation, they had nothing to do with it. Confine the issue of these notes to those who are bona fide creditors of the Government, and not allow the Secretary of the Treasury to throw them into market. If (said Mr. W.) you permit him to do so, you give him a part in the legislative department of the Government. I wish to confine the Secretary of the Treasury to the issue of those notes to the bona fide creditors of the Government, and not give him the power to throw it as a part of the circulating medium of the country. He concluded by sending to the CHAIR an amendment as an additional section to the bill, which was read for information, and which he intended to submit when in order, viz:

Be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, or any officer of the Government, to make a deposite of any amount of Treasury notes with any bank, and to allow such bank the accruing interest on the Treasury notes so deposited, and, in consideration thereof, to acquire the right to check upon the bank for the amount, or in any other manner whatever to use the Treasury notes, or any part thereof, which may be issued in pursuance of this act, to obtain a loan or advance of money upon the credit of such notes, or by a sale thereof, it being the intention of Congress not to authorize the issue of Treasury notes in favor of any person or persons, except a bona fide creditor of the Government.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. COOPER of Georgia and MONTGOMERY of North Carolina, in favor of the bill, and TILLINGHAST, in opposition.

Mr. MONROE said he did not rise to make a speech at that time in the evening, but to appeal to members on all sides to come to a conclusion. After referring to some remarks in the speech of the member from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] on the Florida war, Mr. M. said he considered himself under an implied pledge, by the arrangement of last evening, to do nothing which might prevent the bill being disposed of this evening, and would therefore not detain the House by any further remarks.

Mr. PICKENS said he joined in the appeal of the gentleman from New York, who had just taken his seat. He appealed to the moderate men of all parties to settle the question. It was a simple proposition to issue five millions in Treasury notes. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has informed us that the measure is necessary for the operations of the Government; and yet, night after night, we are detained here in listening to speeches which have hardly any reference to the subject, but full of the political slang of the day. He appealed to gentlemen: was this a proper course? He had been himself opposed to the bill, and was prepared to vote against it, and had said so openly—not because it was unconstitutional, but he considered it an unsafe precedent. He had heard with pain, since he had taken his seat there to-day, of the probability of this Government being involved in difficulties with a foreign power: he trusted these difficulties might be avoided, but was this a moment to be wrangling over small matters? He hoped there would be no collision, but he had serious apprehensions that the friendly relations subsisting between the two countries could not be preserved, and he was willing to give the Government the means of support, and would again join in the appeal of the gentleman from New York to the House to act upon and settle this question.

Mr. RICE GARLAND then resumed and concluded his remarks in opposition to the bill; when, at a quarter to ten o'clock,

Mr. GRAVES obtained the floor, and, after some remarks on what he called the violent appeal made by the member from S. Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] to the moderate portion of the House, intimated an intention of addressing the House at length, not only on the bill itself, but on the political relations of the sections of the party which supported it. Mr. G. however, yielded the floor to

Mr. BELL, who hoped that both sides would consent that the committee rise, and that the bill be made the special order for to-morrow. Mr. B. thought the incidents of this day's debate required or justified that course.

Mr. BROWN of Tennessee inquired whether the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] was present when the agreement was made yesterday?

Mr. BELL said he was not himself a party to that agreement. He was desirous to dispose of this bill, but he thought, from present prospects, it could not be disposed of until a very late hour. He thought the health of the members required that the course he had suggested should be adopted; and that, under such a course, the bill would be disposed of in a manner more consistent with propriety. It would certainly trench on the business of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. RUSSELL] kept such faithful charge; but he (Mr. B.) thought that, under the circumstances, the gentleman could not object.

Mr. GRAVES was indisposed, he said, to do any thing which might have a tendency to set aside the agreement, if gentlemen insisted on carrying it out, though he thought the spirit of it had been broken in upon by gentlemen on the other side, who had occupied so great a portion of the day in the discussion of irrelevant topics. If it was the wish of the committee, he was willing to go on.

Mr. POPE said, if his colleague felt able to go on now, he hoped he would proceed, and that this matter should be determined at the present sitting, if we remained here until daylight. To-morrow was private bill day, and he was averse to trespassing on the little time allowed for the consideration of private claims.

Mr BELL said that, although he was not a party to the agreement, yet, if there was any agreement which the majority of the members considered binding, his proposition, which was made to both sides, would be abortive. He hoped they would not be compelled to spend another night here as they had a former night, or even in discussion. A number of gentlemen stated that they could not stay here without physical suffering. The taking of the yeas and nays alone, on the different questions, would occupy a couple of hours.

Mr. HOWARD said, when the proposition was made yesterday to adjourn, it was understood to be the result of a compromise. He had voted against it, believing that no beneficial result would flow from it, and so did a member from Ohio. We were appealed to as moderate men, not to throw any obstacles in the way of a compromise, and we were induced to change our votes. He appealed to the member from Kentucky [Mr. GRAVES] whether it was right and proper that the health of one hundred members should be endangered, after having been (with a brief interval of rest) forty hours in session, not by discussion on the bill, but for the purpose of discussing the politics of a party or the section of a party. They owed it to one another—they owed it to the health of individual members, to settle this question now. It was supposed yesterday evening, by every one, that this question would be settled to day. And what evidence was there that it would be settled to-morrow, if another compromise were entered into?

Mr. ANDREWS rose to a point of order: whether it was in order, while his colleague [Mr. GRAVES] had the floor, for a member to discuss the question before the committe.

The CHAIR said that the member from Kentucky had yielded the floor.

Mr. GRAVES. Only for a proposition, not for a speech.

The CHAIRMAN said that, if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GRAVES] yielded the floor for any thing but a personal explanation, or a motion to rise, or to take the bill out of committee, he would lose his right to the floor.

Mr. ANDREWS hoped, then, that his colleague, [Mr.

GRAVES,] if he yielded the floor again, would yield it permanently.

Mr. HOWARD renewed his appeal to Mr. GRAVES.

Mr. GRAVES said that, rather than lose his right to the floor, he would proceed in his remarks; but, before doing so, he would say a word in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOWARD.] Of the nine hours during which the committee had been occupied on the bill this day, only one hour had been occupied by the Opposition; the other eight had been taken up by Administration members; and yet the gentleman from Indiana thought that as much time had been given to the Opposition as they had a right to expect. Enough on that head. He would now proceed.

Mr. ALFORD rose, and (Mr. GRAVES having yielded for the moment,) said he had not yet heard any friends of the measure object that the committee should rise, and the House adjourn.

Mr. GRAVES said that, after placing himself and his friends in an erect position, and freeing them from any imputation of having violated the agreement, he was willing, if the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and his friends, who had been parties to that agreement, were willing, to yield for the motion indicated by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. ALFORD.] But he was not willing to be placed before the country as not carrying out the agreement, so far as he was concerned.

A conversation here ensued between Messrs. GRAVES and JONES of Virginia, the result of which was a declaration on the part of the latter, that though there were many who desired an arrangement, yet, as there was a portion of the gentlemen who usually acted with him that were unwilling to submit to any, he did not, in that state of feeling, consider himself at liberty to submit a proposition.

Mr. M. A. COOPER. Did that portion of the friends of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. JONES,] who were unwilling to submit to any arrangement, remain here all night at our last sitting? If they did, I have nothing to say except this, that they do themselves and the country injustice in thus persevering.

[Loud cries of "order! order! we did stay here," &c.]

Mr. GRAVES said he thought the voices of members were about equally divided, one-half crying out "go on," and the other "rise." He thought, therefore, he had better proceed.

Mr. M. A. COOPER moved that the committee rise, and that they agree to dispose of the bill between the hours of 12 and 4 to-morrow, (Friday.) If this was not agreed to, he must be excused from staying here all night.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS. I am willing to make the bill the special order for to-morrow, and that is all I am willing to do.

Mr. GOODE said to-morrow was set apart under the rules for private business. He was opposed to any arrangement being entered into the other day, and he was equally opposed now. He had no confidence in such arrangements.

The CHAIR. The motion is that the committee rise. If gentlemen make any arrangement or compromise, that is another thing, which cannot be carried on through the CHAIR.

Mr. TRIPLETT. I make the specific proposition that the committee rise without any contract, and that the bill be made the special order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS. Are we to understand that if the committee rise, the bill shall be made the special order for to-morrow?

The CHAIR. The committee can make no such agreement: if made at all, it must be done in the House.

Mr. M. A. COOPER. With the leave of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GRAVES,] I now make the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. TRIPLETT. I have already made that distinct motion.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi said he was a young member here, but he supposed that all honorable men were willing to do what was fair and right. They came there expecting to dispose of the bill to-day. Many of them who had remained up all night on Tuesday were greatly fatigued, and he knew were not prepared to sit up to-night. He proposed, therefore, that the committee should rise and report the bill, or, if not report it, that it should be made the special order for to-morrow; failing in which, he proposed that they should again go back into committee.

Mr. LINCOLN said he had taken no part in this controversy. He had not been inclined to interpose any obstacle to the passage of the bill. He came here this morning prepared to vote upon the bill according to the dictates of his own judgment; and he did submit to this committee and to the House whether it was becoming their character and standing before the nation to be bargaining here upon what they would do on questions of propriety. He was willing to sit and vote now, or to come here to-morrow and do that which his conscience dictated to him he ought, as a Representative of the people, to do in relation to the exigencies of the country. But he would neither bargain nor be bargained for by any body. If the majority thought proper to go through with the bill to night, he was willing to remain here and submit to the will of that majority—neither leaving his seat nor avoiding his vote.

[A voice. Were you here all night?]

Mr. L. No, sir; I was not here. I was, by the providence of God, laid upon a bed of sickness, and I was brought from my bed early this morning, and have remained here from that time to this, and I will remain. But I will have nothing to do with bargains.

Mr. RHETT excepted to the opinion of the CHAIR on the point of order, that the committee could not specify a time to resume the consideration of the bill. He contended that the committee could ask leave to rise and sit again at any designated hour, and so from time to time, until they had completed the business before them

The question then being about to be put on Mr. THOMPSON'S motion,

Mr. CLIFFORD demanded tellers, and Messrs. WELLER and CARTER were appointed, who reported—ayes 85, noes 44.

So the committee rose.

A motion was then made by Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania, that the bill be made the special order for 12 o'clock to-morrow; but this was found to come in conflict with a previous special order heretofore made, and taking precedence of all other business, to wit, the report of the Select Committee on the Public Printing.

It appearing that the report, documents, journal of the committee, &c. would take some time in printing (as ordered this day) for the use of the House—

The said report, on motion, was made the special order of the day for Thursday of next week.

And the Treasury Note bill was then made the special order for to-morrow (Friday) at 12 o'clock, to take precedence of all other business.

And then the House, at half past 10, p. m. adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, March 26, 1840.

Mr. WEBSTER presented certain papers in relation to the claim of the heirs of Robert Fulton; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINN presented a paper in relation to the claim of Dr. M. Mansur; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SEVIER presented a letter from the Secretary of War requesting an appropriation for the removal of certain Cherokee Indians in the vicinity of Fort Wayne; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the petition of citizens of Wiskonsin, praying an appropriation for certain internal improvements; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the petition of 245 citizens of Niagara county, New York, in favor of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of the administrator of John B. Fanning, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

The Senate then went into Executive session for some time, and when the doors were opened,

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill to reduce the drawbacks on refined sugar and rum, and to reduce the fishing bounties and allowances in proportion to the reduced duties on sugar, molasses, and salt, reported the same without amendment.

On motion by Mr. B. the bill was made the order of the day for Monday the 15th of April.

The bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, was then taken up, and, the question being taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. NORVELL, it was lost—ayes 1, nays 34.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend the bill, by inserting after "Illinois," the words "east of Vandalia;" which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama proposed to amend the bill, by striking out the last section—(the two per cent. clause.)

After some remarks by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, and Mr. YOUNG, the bill was postponed, and made the order of the day for to morrow.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

The CHAIR submitted the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate, herewith, copies of official notes which have passed between the Secretary of State and the British Minister, since my last message, on the subject of the resolutions of the 17th of January.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, 26th March, 1840.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth.

WASHINGTON, March 13, 1840.

The undersigned, her Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, has been instructed by his Government to make the following communication to the Secretary of State of the United States, in reference to the boundary negotiation, and the affairs of the disputed territory.

Her Majesty's Government have had under their consideration the official note addressed to the undersigned by the Secretary of State of the United States, on the 24th of last December, in reply to a note from the undersigned of the 2d of November preceding, in which the undersigned protested, in the name of his Government, against the extensive system of aggression pursued by the people of the State of Maine within the disputed territory, to the prejudice of the rights of Great Britain, and in manifest violation of the provisional agreements entered into between the authorities of the two countries at the beginning of the last year.

Her Majesty's Government have also had their attention directed to the public message transmitted by the Governor of Maine to the Legislature of the State, on the 3d of January of the present year.

Upon a consideration of the statements contained in these two official documents, her Majesty's Government regret to find that the principal acts of encroachment which were denounced and complained of on the part of Great Britain, so far from being either disproved, or discontinued, or satisfactorily explained by the authorities of the State of Maine, are, on the contrary, persisted in, and publicly avowed.

Her Majesty's Government have consequently instructed the undersigned once more formally to protest against those acts of encroachment and aggression.

Her Majesty's Government claim and expect from the good faith of the Government of the United States, that the people of Maine shall replace themselves in the situation in which they stood before the agreements of last year were signed—that they shall therefore retire from the valley of the St. John, and confine themselves to the valley of the Aroostook; that they shall occupy that valley in a temporary manner only, for the purpose, as agreed upon, of preventing depredations; and that they shall not construct fortifications, nor make roads or permanent settlements.

Until this be done by the people of the State of Maine, and so long as that people shall persist in the present system of aggression, her Majesty's Government will feel it their duty to make such military arrangements as may be required for the protection of her Majesty's rights. And her Majesty's Government deem it right to declare that if the result of the unjustifiable proceedings of the State of Maine should be collision between her Majesty's troops and the people of that State, the responsibility of all the consequences that may ensue therefrom, be they what they may, will rest with the people and Government of the United States.

The undersigned has been instructed to add to this communication, that her Majesty's Government are only waiting for the detailed report of the British commissioners recently employed to survey the disputed territory, which report, it was believed, would be completed and delivered to her Majesty's Government by the end of the present month, in order to transmit to the Government of the United States a reply to their last proposal upon the subject of the boundary negotiation.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to the Secretary of State of the United States the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

H. S. FOX.

Hon. JOHN FORSYTH, &c.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 25, 1840.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, acknowledges to have received Mr. Fox's communication of the 13th instant, in reference to the boundary negotiation and the affairs of the disputed territory. The information given in the closing part of it, that a reply to the last proposition of the United States upon the subject of the boundary may be expected in a short time, is highly gratifying to the President, who has, however, given directions to the undersigned in making this acknowledgment, to accompany it with the expression of his profound regret that Mr. Fox's note is in no other respect satisfactory.

After the arrangements which, in the beginning of last year, were entered into on the part of the two Governments with regard to the occupation of the disputed territory, the President had indulged the hope that the causes of irritation which had grown out of this branch of the subject could have been removed. Relying on the disposition of Maine to cooperate with the Federal Government in all that could lead to a pacific adjustment of the principal question, the President felt confident that his determination to maintain order and peace on the border would be fully carried out. He looked upon all apprehensions of designs by the people of Maine to take possession of the territory, as without adequate foundation; deeming it improbable that on the eve of an amicable adjustment of the question, any portion of the American people would, without cause and without object, jeopard the success of the negotiation and endanger the peace of the country. A troublesome, irritating, and comparatively unimportant, because subordinate, subject, being thus disposed of, the President hoped that the parties would be left free at once to discuss and finally adjust the principal question. In this he has been disappointed. While the proceedings of her Majesty's Government at home, have been attended with unlooked for delays, its attention has been diverted from the great subject in controversy by repeated complaints, imputing to a portion of the people of the United States designs to violate the engagements of their Government; designs which have never been entertained and which Mr. Fox knows would receive no countenance from this Government.

It is to be regretted that at this late hour, so much misapprehension still exists on the side of the British Government, as to the object and obvious meaning of the existing arrangements respecting the disputed territory. The ill success which appears to have attended the efforts made by the undersigned to convey, through Mr. Fox to her Majesty's Government, more correct impressions respecting them, calls for a recurrence to the subject, and a brief review of the correspondence which has grown out of it, may tend to remove the erroneous views which prevail, as to the manner in which the terms of the arrangements referred to have been observed.

As Mr. Fox had no authority to make any agreement respecting the exercise of jurisdiction over the disputed territory, that between him and the undersigned, of the 27th of February, 1839, had for its object some provisional arrangement for the restoration and preservation of peace in the Territory. To accomplish this object, it provided that her Majesty's officers should not seek to expel, by military force, the armed party which had been sent by Maine into the district bordering on the Restook river; and that, on the other hand, the Government of Maine would voluntarily, and without needless delay, withdraw beyond the bounds of the disputed territory any armed force then within them. Besides this, the arrangement had other objects—the dispersion of notorious trespassers, and the protection of public property from depredation. In case future necessity should arise for this, the operation was to be conducted by concert, jointly or separately, according to agreement between the Government of Maine and New Brunswick.

In this last mentioned respect, the agreement looked to some further arrangement between Maine and New Brunswick. Through the agency of General Scott, one was agreed to, on the 23d and 25th of March following, by which Sir John Harvey bound himself not to seek, without renewed instructions to that effect from his Government, to take military possession of the Territory, or to repel from it by military force the armed civil posse, or the troops of Maine. On the part of Maine, it was agreed by her Governor that no attempt should be made without renewed instructions from the Legislature, to disturb by arms the province of New Brunswick in the possession of the Madawaska settlements, or interrupt the usual communications between that and the upper provinces. As to possession and jurisdiction, they were to remain unchanged, each party holding, in fact, possession of part of the disputed Territory, but each denying the right of the other to do so. With that understanding, Maine was, without unnecessary delay, to withdraw her military force, leaving only, under a land agent, a small civil posse, armed or unarmed, to protect the timber recently cut, and to prevent further depredations.

In the complaints of infractions of the agreements of the State of Maine, addressed to the undersigned, Mr. Fox has assumed two positions, which are not authorized by the terms of those agreements: 1st, admitting the right of Maine to maintain a civil posse in the disputed territory for the purposes stated in the agreement, he does so with the restriction that the action of the posse was to be confined within certain limits; and 2d, by making the advance of the Maine posse into the valley of the Upper St. John, the ground of his complaint of encroachment upon the Madawaska settlement, he assumes to extend the limits of that settlement beyond those it occupied at the date of the agreement.

The United States cannot acquiesce in either of these positions.

In the first place, nothing is found in the agreement subscribed to by Governor Fairfield and Sir John Harvey, defining any limits in the disputed territory within which the operations of the civil posse of Maine were to be circumscribed. The task of preserving the timber recently cut, and of preventing further depredations within the disputed territory, was assigned to the State of Maine after her military force should have been withdrawn from it; and it was to be accomplished by a civil posse, armed or unarmed, which was to continue in the territory, and to operate in every part of it where its agency might be required to protect the timber already cut, and prevent further depredations, without any limitation whatever, or any restrictions, except such as might be construed into an attempt to disturb by arms the Province of New Brunswick in her possession of the Madawaska settlement, or interrupt the usual communication between the Provinces. It is thus in the exercise of a legitimate right, and in the conscientious discharge of an obligation imposed upon her by a solemn compact, that the State of Maine has done those acts which have given rise to complaints for which no adequate cause is perceived. The undersigned feels confident that when those acts shall have been considered by her Majesty's Government at home, as explained in his note to Mr. Fox, of the 24th of December last, and in connexion with the foregoing remarks, they will no longer be viewed as calculated to excite the apprehensions of her Majesty's Government that the faith of existing arrangements is to be broken on the part of the United States.

With regard to the second position assumed by Mr. Fox, that the advance of the Maine posse along the valley of the Restook to the mouth of Fish River, and into the valley of the Upper St. John, is at variance with the terms and spirit of the agreements—the undersigned must observe that if at variance with any of their provisions, it could only be with those which secure her Majesty's Province of New Brunswick against any attempt to disturb the possession of the Madawaska settlement, and to interrupt the usual communications between New Brunswick and the Upper Provinces. The agreement could only have reference to the Madawaska settlements as confined within their actual limits at the time it was subscribed. The undersigned, in his note of the 24th of December last, stated the reasons why the mouth of Fish River and the portion of the valley of the St. John through which it passes, could in no proper sense be considered as embraced in the Madawaska settlements. Were the United States to admit the pretension set up on the part of Great Britain, to give to the Madawaska settlements a degree of constructive extension that might, at this time, suit the purposes of her Majesty's colonial authorities, those settlements might soon be made, with like justice, to embrace any portions of the disputed territory; and the right given to the Province of New Brunswick to occupy them temporarily and for a special purpose might, by inference quite as plausible, give the jurisdiction exercised by her Majesty's authorities an extent which would render the present state of the question, so long as it could be maintained, equivalent to a decision on the merits of the whole controversy in favor of Great Britain. If the small settlement at Madawaska on the north side of the St. Johns means the whole valley of that river—if a boom across the Fish river, and a station of a small posse on the south side of the St. Johns at the mouth of Fish river is a disturbance of that settlement, which is twenty-five miles below, within the meaning of the agreement, it is difficult to conceive that there are any limitations to the pretensions of her Majesty's Government under it, or how the State of Maine could exercise the preventive power with regard to trespassers, which was, on her part, the great object of the temporary arrangement. The movements of British troops, lately witnessed in the disputed territory, and the erection of military works for their protection and accommodation, of which authentic information, recently received at the Department of State, has been communicated to Mr. Fox, impart a still graver aspect to the matter immediately under consideration. The fact of those military operations established beyond a doubt, left unexplained, or unsatisfactorily accounted for, by Mr. Fox's note of the 7th instant, continues an abiding cause of complaint on the part of the United States against her Majesty's colonial agents, as inconsistent with arrangements whose main object was to divest a question, already sufficiently perplexed and complicated, from such embarrassments as those with which the proceedings of the British authorities cannot fail to surround it.

If, as Mr. Fox must admit, the objects of the late agreements were the removal of all military force and the preservation of the property from further spoliations, leaving the possession and jurisdiction as they stood before the State of Maine found itself compelled to act against the trespassers, the President cannot but consider that the conduct of the American local authorities strongly and most favorably contrasts with that of the colonial authorities of her Majesty's Government. While the one, promptly withdrawing its military force, has confined itself to the use of the small posse, armed as agreed upon, and has done no act not necessary to the accomplishment of the conventional objects, every measure taken or indicated by the other party, is essentially military in its character, and can be justified only by a well founded apprehension that hostilities must ensue.

With such feelings and convictions, the President could not see, without painful surprise, the attempt of Mr. Fox, under instructions from his Government, to give to the existing state of things a character not warranted by the friendly disposition of the United States or the conduct of the authorities and people of Maine—much more is he surprised to find it alleged as a ground for strengthening a military force and preparing for a hostile collision with the unarmed inhabitants of a friendly State, pursuing, within their own borders, their peaceful occupations, or exerting themselves in compliance with their agreements to protect the property in dispute from unauthorized spoliation.

The President wishes that he could dispel the fear that these dark forebodings can be realized. Unless her Majesty's Government shall forthwith arrest all military interference in the question—unless it shall apply to the subject more determined efforts than have hitherto been made to bring the dispute to a certain and pacific adjustment, the misfortunes predicted by Mr. Fox in the name of his Government, may most unfortunately happen. But no apprehension of the consequences alluded to by Mr. Fox can be permitted to divert the Government and people of the United States from the performance of their duty to the State of Maine. That duty is as simple as it is imperative. The construction which is given by her to the treaty of 1783 has been, again and again, and in the most solemn manner, asserted also by the Federal Government, and must be maintained, unless Maine freely consents to a new boundary, or unless that construction of the treaty is found to be erroneous by the decision of a disinterested and independent tribunal, selected by the parties for its final adjustment. The President, on assuming the duties of his station, avowed his determination, all other means of negotiation failing, to submit a proposition to the Government of Great Britain to refer the decision of the question once more to a third party.

In all the subsequent steps which have been taken upon the subject by his direction, he has been actuated by the same spirit. Neither his disposition in the matter, nor his opinion as to the propriety of that course, has undergone any change. Should the fulfilment of his wishes be defeated either by an unwillingness on the part of her Majesty's Government to meet the offer of the United States in the spirit in which it is made, or from adverse circumstances of any description, the President will, in any event, derive great satisfaction from the consciousness that no effort on his part has been spared to bring the question to an amicable conclusion, and that there has been nothing in the conduct either of the Governments and people of the United States, or of the State of Maine, to justify the employment of her Majesty's forces as indicated by Mr. Fox's letter. The President cannot, under such circumstances, apprehend that the responsibility for any consequences which may unhappily ensue, will, by the just judgment of an impartial world, be imputed to the United States.

The undersigned avails himself, &c. &c. &c.

JOHN FORSYTH.

To the Hon. H. S. Fox, &c.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth.

WASHINGTON, March 26, 1840.

The undersigned, her Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, has had the honor to receive the official note of yesterday's date, addressed to him by Mr. Forsyth, Secretary of State of the United States, in reply to a note dated the 13th inst. wherein the undersigned, in conformity with instructions received from his Government, had anew formally protested against the acts of encroachment and aggression which are still persisted in by armed bands in the employment of the State of Maine within certain portions of the disputed territory.

It will be the duty of the undersigned immediately to transmit Mr. Forsyth's note to her Majesty's Government in England; and until the statements and propositions which it contains shall have received the due consideration of her Majesty's Government, the undersigned will not deem it right to add any further reply thereto, excepting to refer to, and to repeat, as he now formally and distinctly does, the several declarations which it has from time to time been his duty to make to the Government of the United States with reference to the existing posture of affairs in the disputed territory, and to record his opinion, that an inflexible adherence to the resolutions that have been announced by her Majesty's Government, for the defence of her Majesty's rights pending the negotiation of the boundary question, offers to her Majesty's Government the only means of protecting those rights from being in a continually aggravated manner encroached upon and violated.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to the Secretary of State of the United States the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

H. S. FOX.

The Honorable JOHN FORSYTH, &c. &c. &c.

After a discussion, in which Messrs. DAVIS, WEBSTER, and WILLIAMS, participated, the message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed; and 10,000 additional copies were ordered.

The Senate then adjourned

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 27, 1840.

The CHAIR communicated a report from the Secretary of the Navy, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, in relation to the rank of Charles Wilkes, jr. and William L. Hudson; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORVELL presented to the Senate two memorials, very numerously signed by the citizens of the State of Michigan, praying Congress to pass a general bankrupt law.

While up, he would say that he had reason to believe that scarcely any difference of opinion existed among the people of Michigan on the subject. All desired, many of them earnestly desired, the exercise by Congress of its constitutional power to execute a general law of bankruptcy. He himself considered it essential to the welfare and prosperity of a large portion of the most industrious and enterprising citizens of the United States.

The memorials were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. N. also presented a memorial from a number of the citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, praying that Congress may interpose to affect a mitigation, if not an entire remission, of the residue of the punishment to which WILLIAM LYON MACKENZIE, late member of the Provincial Parliament of Upper Canada, was sentenced, last fall, by the district court of western New York, for a violation of the laws of the United States, passed for the preservation of their neutral obligations.

Mr. N. said that the memorial was of a novel and peculiar nature; and he was somewhat at a loss what disposition to make of it. The prerogative of clemency and mercy, in such cases, belonged exclusively to the Executive; and he did not know that Congress could interfere, by legislative action, in the matter. While, therefore, he cordially concurred in the object which the memorialists had in view, he must submit the appropriate direction for the memorial to take, to the better judgment of more experienced Senators. It was short, and he asked that it might be read. It was accordingly read; and, after some hesitation on the subject, the memorial was, on motion, referred to the President of the United States.

Mr. N. also presented a memorial from Edward S. Deacon, of Michigan, praying for an appropriation for the erection of a light house at Port Shaldor, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of John McClenaham; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LUMPKIN presented a petition numerously signed by citizens of Columbus, Georgia, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BENTON presented a petition from Fulton county, New York, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law, to embrace corporations within its provisions; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial from citizens of Poughkeepsie, one from Seneca county, and one from Westchester county, severally praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. T. also presented the petition of Thomas Amerman; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. T. also presented the memorial of certain shipowners and shipmasters of the city of New York, praying that N. P. Trist, consul at Havana, may be superseded by a more worthy man; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MERRICK presented the memorial of Mary Linn; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. M. also presented the memorial of E. S. Gardner, agent for persons who have claims against the Government for supplies furnished to the army in Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. YOUNG presented a memorial signed by 360 citizens of Chicago in favor of the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented the memorial of Stokes and Purdom, praying remuneration for losses incurred in a mail contract; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MOUTON presented the memorial of King and Wilson; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. M. also presented the petition of Robert McCarty, which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Don Carlos Dehault Delassus, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

The bill for the better security of the public money in the hands of officers and agents of the Government, was taken up on its third reading.

Mr. HENDERSON moved to recommit the bill, with certain instructions; which, after some remarks by WRIGHT, Messrs. HENDERSON, SMITH of Indiana, HUBBARD, and PRENTISS, was disagreed to—ayes 10, noes 27.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

Mr. MERRICK submitted the following motion, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making suitable provision for all widows of officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary war, who have not formed any subsequent matrimonial connection.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, was then taken up, the question being on the amendment proposed yesterday by Mr. CLAY of Alabama.

Mr. CLAY addressed the Senate at length in favor of his amendment, and against the bill generally, and was replied to by Mr. YOUNG and Mr. TAPPAN.

Without taking any question,

The Senate adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, March 27, 1840.

Mr. HOWARD rose and asked leave to correct a statement in a report from the Treasury Department respecting the salary of the District Attorney of Indiana, and he sent to the CHAIR and had read the following correspondence in explanation of the matter, viz:

OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY.
March 26, 1840.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 20th, requesting a copy of the Clerk's statement, or other document from which the Secretary states, in a report to Congress, that the salary and fees of the District Attorney of Indiana for the year 1839 was $1214.

In reply I have to state that the report referred to is founded on reports from the Attorneys, Clerks and Marshals, made direct to the Secretary. Upon inquiry at that office, I am informed that the Clerk, in making up the general report of the Secretary from the reports of these several officers, made a mistake in the instance to which you refer, by charging the sum of $1214 to the District Attorney instead of the Marshal. I inclose a copy of the report to the Secretary from which the charge was made, from which this will be apparent.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

M. BIRCHARD,
Solicitor of the Treasury.

The Hon. T. A. HOWARD,
House of Representatives United States.

MADISON, (Indiana,) January 14, 1840.

SIR: In obedience to your circular of the 30th January, 1839, I have the honor to inform you that the whole amount of money received by me as marshal of this district, and by my deputies from the 1st of January, 1839, to the 1st of January, 1840, including per diem allowance during the sittings of the courts, mileage, disbursements, and all other fees, excepting my annual salary, is one thousand and fourteen dollars and forty-two cents.

I am, &c.

GAM. TAYLOR,
United States Marshal Indiana District.

Honorable LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the Treasury.

NOTE.—Fees as above - - -	$1,014 42

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES of Virginia, the House resolved into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. DAWSON in the chair,) and took up the Treasury Note bill.

Mr. BARNARD here rose and complained of an article in the Globe, censuring his course for detaining the Committee of the Whole. The Globe stated that he occupied the floor from the hour of 6 o'clock, instead of 10½ o'clock.

Mr. GRAVES here spoke at great length, and in the course of his remarks adverted to the course of Mr. BLACK in relation to the election of public Printer; to which

Mr. BLACK of Georgia said he did not rise for the purpose of making a speech on the merits of the bill now under consideration, but for the purpose of putting himself right before the committee and the country, in a matter which may well be called a "vexed question," and about which a great deal had been said here and elsewhere; he alluded to the part he had taken in the election of Printer, and the disposition made by the House of the Congressional printing. If, in so doing, he placed any man in the wrong, it was not with the intention of prosecuting an offensive warfare, but simply in justification to himself, and those who had acted with him. This much he felt himself imperatively called on to do, from the manner in which the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GRAVES] had spoken of that transaction, and from the distinct allusions which had been made to him in the course of the debate. If he understood that gentleman correctly, he had deprecated the election of Francis P. Blair to the office of Printer; pronounced it premature and precipitate; in consequence of which a previous investigation into alleged frauds had been superseded and precluded by the House; and that, too, said the gentleman, when we were getting along very well and smoothly, by letting out the printing on contract.

Sir, said Mr. B. the gentleman from Kentucky, the Whigs, and others, who voted with that gentleman for a certain resolution, to which I shall presently refer, effected indirectly and covertly, by its adoption, that which I did directly and openly, in the election which followed. That, and that alone, after all that has been said, is the difference between us.

Sir, let us look to that resolution for a moment, and recur to its origin and history. It was introduced into this House, and advocated on its passage, by my colleague, [Mr DAWSON.] By it, the Clerk of this House, a confirmed Democrat, was ordered "to supply some suitable person or persons to execute the necessary printing of this House, in the manner prescribed by the joint resolution of 1819." I will not assert that the gentleman voted for this resolution; but this much I will say, that if he voted or raised his voice against it in this hall, I was not present, and did not hear him. So far as I am informed, he sat by and suffered that resolution, introduced by a gentleman who usually acts with the Whig party, to pass this House, sub silentio, not only the first, but the second time, if I remember correctly. What, then, was the purport, the effect, the consequence of that action of the House? It was that a Democratic Clerk should select, at his option, some individual to execute the printing of Congress upon the terms fixed by the resolution of 1819. This proposition came directly from the Whig ranks, and was supported alike by Whig and Democrat. This, then, was the generally received sense of the House, and was acquiesced in by the gentleman from Kentucky himself, who, if he was present at its adoption, said not one word, as I have heard, in opposition to it. What, sir, was the natural and necessary consequence of all this? Every man here, who had his senses about him, knew, or ought to have known, that this same Francis P. Blair, who has been vilified and abused through all the avenues by which detraction can reach the character of a man, whether justly or not I will not now stop to inquire, for I am not his champion. This same heinous and offensive Blair, upon the proposition, and by the votes of the Whigs themselves, was indirectly made the Printer of this House, without any limitation as to price, save that imposed by the joint resolution of 1819. All parties here knew, as well as I did, that HUGH A. GARLAND, the Democratic Clerk of the House, to whom the selection of a Printer was thus referred by Colonel DAWSON'S resolution, would appoint Mr. BLAIR, his politically ally, and who was every way competent to the discharge and execution of that trust. Did this appointment disappoint any one here? No, sir! Every body well knew who would be made Printer, as soon as the Clerk was entrusted with the selection of that officer.

Under these circumstances, when Mr. Blair was comfortably seated in his newly acquired office, for which he was perhaps more indebted to the Whigs than the Democrats, I had the honor to come forward and unsettle this state of things, so propitious to the Editor of the Globe, and to arrest the official patronage which had been indirectly cast upon that functionary by Col. DAWSON'S resolution. Is not this so? I appeal, said Mr. B. to the resolution which I subsequently offered upon this subject, and which was adopted by the House; by which it will appear that, instead of making the Editor of the Globe the sure and certain recipient of the printing patronage, under the prices of 1819, he was subjected to all the contingences and uncertainties of an election, where parties are so nearly balanced, and restricted in the remuneration he was to receive for services to such terms and such a tariff of prices as he House, after an investigation of the subject, might think proper to adopt.

Sir, said Mr. B. I have nothing to urge against gentlemen for their support of the Editor of the Globe. I supported him myself, not only upon the occasion referred to, but subsequently, at the election, openly and fearlessly, while others hid themselves behind the responsibility of the Clerk's appointment. I voted for him viva voce, because I believed, all things considered, he was more entitled to my support than the Editors of the National Intelligencer. For this choice between two contending candidates, I am ready and willing, as I will do upon some future occasion, to answer to my constituents, to whom alone I hold myself responsible for my acts here. But, sir, this is what I complain of, and herein have I been badly and unjustly treated, and proscribed by some, without even a hearing of my case; that while I am rebuked and condemned by the gentleman from Kentucky, and those with whom he is associated, for having participated in the election of Mr. Blair to be the Printer of this House, those who voted for Col. DAWSON'S resolution are either applauded for their patriotism and consistency, or at least passed over in commendatory silence.

Yes, sir; "let it be written on the wall" that this identical Blair, who has been denounced by the Whigs for every thing odious, both morally and politically, was made the happy recipient of Government patronage, by a resolution emanating from the Whig ranks, and supported by that party, while I have been rebuked and condemned for doing that openly, which they thought proper to effect indirectly and covertly! "Think of that, Master Brook!"

The debate was further continued by Messrs. PICKENS, EVERETT, FISHER, BELL, SMITH of Maine, MONROE, DAVIS of Ky. MORGAN, RAMSEY, COOPER of Pa. DAVIS of Ia. KEIM, COOPER of Pa. in reply, ALFORD, and STANLY, which will be published hereafter; when

Mr. HABERSHAM submitted the following, to come in as an amendment to the end of the second section of the bill:

"Which notes, so to be issued, shall be negotiable only by special endorsement by, and to, each person through whose hands they may pass, subject to the same rules and restrictions as inland bills of exchange, payable to order, but without the liability of the endorser."

The question was put on its adoption, and it was disagreed to without a count.

Mr. UNDERWOOD submitted the following amendment:

Be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, or any officer of the Government, to make a deposite of any amount of Treasury notes with any bank, and to allow such bank the accruing interest on the Treasury notes so deposited, and, in consideration thereof, to acquire the right to check upon the bank for the amount, or in any other manner whatever to use the Treasury notes, or any part thereof, which may be issued in pursuance of this act, to obtain a loan or advance of money upon the credit of such notes, or by a sale thereof, it being the intention of Congress not to authorize the issue of Treasury notes in favor of any person or persons, except a bona fide creditor of the Government.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana demanded tellers to take a count on the adoption of this amendment, and Messrs. P. F. THOMAS and CRABB having been appointed such, reported that there were—ayes 69, noes 90.

So it was rejected.

The amendment of Mr. BARNARD, previously offered, being next in order, as follows:

"Amend by striking out all after the word 'notes,' in the second line of the second section, and insert, 'may be issued by the authority of this act, not to exceed, in the whole amount issued, five millions of dollars; such notes in no case to be made for a less sum than one thousand dollars, and to be issued no faster than shall be demanded, as a means of borrowing money for the exigencies of the Treasury.'"

Mr. BARNARD made a few remarks in explanation of the principles of his amendment; when

Mr. COOPER of Georgia said he was willing to accept that part of the amendment which limits the issue to the wants of the Government; but was opposed to the restriction as to the denomination of the notes.

Mr. CRABB suggested to Mr. BARNARD to leave the denomination of the note blank; to which suggestion he yielded.

The CHAIR said the question would be on filling the blank; when

Mr. MONTGOMERY moved to fill it with $10.

Mr. R GARLAND named $50.

Mr. CHINN named $20.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia named $100.

Mr. BARNARD named $500

All which propositions to fill the blank were taken up in their order, and rejected.

The question being on the amendment, after a few remarks from Messrs. R. GARLAND, JONES, KING, and FILLMORE, the question was taken by tellers, and disagreed to.

Mr. PROFFIT submitted an amendment, praying to appropriate $450,000 of the notes to be issued, to the completion of the Cumberland road in Ohio, Indiana and Illinois.

Messrs. PROFFIT, WICK, RARIDEN, and MASON, made a few remarks in favor of the amendment, which will be published hereafter, and

Mr. JONES of Virginia appealed to the mover not to embarrass the passage of this bill, by an effort to attach to it an amendment relating to a question of which many of the friends of the bill now before the committee had constitutional objections. He suggested that it would be much better to leave the question of the Cumberland road alone, until the bill which was now before the Senate, for that object, should be sent to the House.

The question being on the adoption of the amendment,

Mr. RARIDEN called for tellers to take a count.

Messrs. STEWART and HUBBARD having been appointed such, reported that there were—ayes 71, nays 87.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr COOPER of Georgia submitted the following as an additional section to the bill:

SEC 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be hereby authorized and instructed to sell the bonds of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania belonging to the Government, at the best market price, and place the proceeds to the credit of the Treasury of the United States; and that said sum, when realized, shall operate to diminish the amount of Treasury notes hereby authorized to be issued, in a sum equal thereto.

The question on its adoption was put, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. MONTGOMERY offered an amendment, fixing the lowest denomination of notes at ten dollars; which was lost without a count.

Mr. TILLINGHAST submitted the following amendment; and it was disagreed to without a count:

"Strike out from the second section all between the word 'issued,' in the third line, and the word 'fine,' in the fifth line, and insert in lieu thereof the following: 'Not exceeding in amount the aggregate of'"

Mr. CURTIS offered the following amendments as a substitute for the second section of the bill, viz:

SEC 2. That the amount of Treasury notes authorized to be issued by the provisions and regulations of the said act shall not, in the aggregate of all the issues thereof, exceed the amount of five millions of dollars; and the same may be redeemed sooner than one year, if the means of the Treasury shall permit, by giving sixty days' notice; and no interest to be allowed thereon after the expiration of sixty days.

After a few remarks from Mr. GRAVES as to what amount the Secretary would be enabled to issue in the course of the year under the bill,

Mr. JONES said the bill had been printed, and every gentleman had been afforded an opportunity to scrutinize its provisions; and it seemed to him there could be no misunderstanding in relation to it. It only gives the Secretary the power to keep out five millions for the year, and did not, as some gentleman seemed to suppose, give him the power to cancel and reissue.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was disagreed to without a count.

The question was then taken on the substitute for the bill, submitted by Mr. KING of Ga. providing for five millions by loan, bearing legal interest; which was, however, disagreeded to without a count.

Mr. R. GARLAND submitted the following as an additional section to the bill.

Be it further enacted, That an account shall be kept in the Treasurer's office, of each note issued under the provisions of this act, and of the number of times each note shall be reissued; also, of each note that shall be issued in the place of any note previously issued.

Mr JONES said the original bill already provides that an account shall be kept of the number of the notes issued. This bill, as he before said, does not provide for a reissue; but simply gives the Secretary powee to issue five millions in such proportions as the wants of the Government demand, and to keep it out during the year.

The amendment was then disagreed to without a count.

On motion of Mr. JOES of Virginia, the committee then rose and reported the bill to the House; when

Mr. EASTMAN said, that, since a member of this House, this was the first time he had been able to obtain the floor. He had made the attempt on two or three previous occasions, but had been unsuccessful. He believed it to be the duty of every gentleman, at all times, to make such a speech as would most conduce to the interest of his constituents and of the country. He should himself pursue that course now; and in accordance with those views he now moved the previous question, which was seconded; and

The question then being, "Shall the main question be now put,"

Mr. R. GARLAND demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered and were—yeas 105, nays 79, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alford, Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, John Campbell, Carr, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Conner, Mark A. Cooper, Wm. R. Cooper, Crary, Cross, Dana, Davee, Dawson, Dickerson, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, J. Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of N. C. Hillen, Holleman, Holmes, Hook, Hubbard, Jackson, J. Johnson, C. Johnson, Nat. Jones, J. W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Parrish, Parmenter, Paynter, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rhett, Rives, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Albert Smith, John Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—105.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, J. W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Bond, Botts, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, Carter, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, James Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Deberry, Dillett, Edwards, Evans, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Graves, Green, Habersham, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hoffman, Howard, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, Lincoln, McCarty, Marvin, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Palen, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Taliaferro, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Warren, John White, Wick, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—79.

So the main question was ordered to be put; which main question was: "Shall the bill be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading?"

Mr BANKS wished to see, after so much opposition, who was really opposed to the bill, and demanded the yeas and nays on the engrossment, which were ordered, and were—yeas 115, nays 76, as follows:

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

The question now being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. PROFFIT moved to recommit the bill, with instructions requiring the committee of Ways and Means to report an amendment to the bill, appropriating $450,000 for continuing the Cumberland road in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Mr. BANKS said the amendment was a violation of the rule, but he moved the previous question, which was seconded.

Some conversation here arose between the SPEAKER and Messrs. ADAMS, RARIDEN, and PROFFIT, as to the effect of the previous question, whether it brought the House to a vote on the motion to recommit, or on the passage of the bill; when

The SPEAKER decided that, under the operation of the previous question, the main question would be, "shall the bill pass?" Consequently, those who voted against ordering the main question, voted for the rejection of the bill.

The vote was then taken on the question, "shall the main question be now put?" and decided in the affirmative—yeas 109, nays 66.
